The principal Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Butis, otherwise Berenice: By Seleucus, King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the Name of that Pella in Macedon, in which both Philip the Father, and his Son Alexander the Great were born. It was taken, and in part demolished, by Alexander Jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews Laws; but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Judas Macchabæus, where he set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols, together with all those that fled thereinto for Sanctuary; and near it they place the Castle of Carnien, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of (f) Ephron near Jordan, which refusing to yield Passage to (g) Judas Macchabæus, was forced by him by Assault, and taken, and burnt with great Slaughter.

(c) Anciently as it seems, it was called Tophel. See above in the Bounds of the Plains of Moab, in this Chapter. § 4. † 2.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabesus, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by (b) Nahas, King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elsewhere mentioned. In Memory whereof, the Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed, and buried the Bodies of Saul and his Sons, which hung despitefully over the Walls of Bethsan or Scythopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Pliny on a Hill near the River Hieromiace, which River Ortelius seems to think to be Jaboc. At the Foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot Bathes, as at Macharus. Alexander Jannæus, after ten Months Siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it; and Gabinius (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Jerusalem being the First, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the Third, Jericho and Sephora in Galilee the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the Tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Julius Cæsar of many Crimes; but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible (n) Revenge of Herod, they slew themselves; some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara, they place Sebei (o) in which Josephus, Ant. 5. 13. saith, Jephtha was buried; whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Sepultus est in Civitate sua Gilehad, (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the Name of a City, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following, the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon: The same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Civitas; so of one City, Hesbon, or Chesbon, which they call Essebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more. This Casphor in Manasses, and a City in Gad, which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the Back of a Camel) which Josephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis, over against Tarichea, which is on the West-side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias. See this in Josephus his fourth Book of the Jewish War, where he describes the place by Nature to be almost invincible; and in the Story of the Siege, shews how Vespasian, with much danger of his own Person, entring it, was as first repulsed, with other very memorable Accidents; and how at length, after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping down the Rocks, with their Wives and Children, to the Number of five thousand, thus perished; besides four thousand slain by the Romans; so that none escaped, save only two Women that hid themselves.

Cap. 1. 3.

About four Miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Josephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomy gives the Name to the Hills that compass the Plains in which it standeth: So that it may seem to have been of no small Note. It is seated far from the Hill-Country: On the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey; after by Augustus added to Herod's Tetrarchy: It was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their Rebellion: When by many Massacres of their Nation, they were inraged against their Borderers.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrebi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: And near unto this his Regal City, it was that he lost the Battle and his Life. It stood in S. Hierom's time; and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not far from these Towns near Jordan, in this valley stood Gerasa or Gergesa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fifth Son of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we read Matt. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tyberias, landed in their Coasts; where casting the Devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the Herd of Hogs: In which Story for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Mark have Gadarens; not as if these were all one (for Gergesa or Gerasa is a distinct Town in these parts from Gadera) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities Neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This City received many changes and calamities; of which Josephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Vespasian; and 1000. of the ablest young Men put to the Sword, and the City burnt. In the year 1120. it was re-built by Baldwin King of Damascus; and in the same year recovered by Baldwin de Burgo King of Jerusalem, and by him utterly razed. Near unto Gerasa is the Village of Magedan, or after the Syriak Magedu, or after the Greek Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadduces desired of our Saviour a Sign from Heaven; the same place or ſome adjoining to it, which S. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the Circumſtances of which Story it appears, that this Coaſt lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brochard makes both theſe places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the Fountain of Jordan according to Joſephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethſaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the Story, not far hence towards the North was the Deſart of Bethſaida, where Chriſt filled 5000 People with the five Barley Loaves and two Fiſhes.

Matt. 14. Marc. 6. Luc. 11. Joh. 6.

On the North of this Bethſaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was ſometime a Village, and not long after the Birth of Chriſt it was compaſſed with a Wall by Phillip the Tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis; and after the Name of Julia, the Wife of Tiberius, called Julias, as hath been farther ſpoken in the Tribe of Gad, where it was noted, that Joſephus makes this Julias, to be the ſame as Bethſaida. Upon the Eaſt ſide of the ſame Lake of Tyberias ſtands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Chriſt in Matthew; Wo be unto the Corazim.

Joſep. 8. ant. 3. & alibi.

But the Principal City of all theſe in ancient time was Aſteroth, ſometimes peopled with the Giants Raphaim; and therefore the Country adjoining called the Land of Giants, of whoſe race was Og, King of Baſan. In Geneſis this City is called Aſteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called ſimply Carnaim, as Joſ. 13. 21. it is called Aſteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim ſignifieth a pair of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idol Aſtoreth, which was the Image of a Sheep, as it is elſewhere noted, that Aſteroth in Deut. ſignifieth Sheep. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have been the Name of the People which inhabited this City, and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5.) were Gyant-like men, as appears by comparing the Words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex reſiduo gigantum, with the Words Joſ. 13. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphaæorum; but if the Karnaim (or Karnaijm) were theſe Raphæi, the word would not have been in the dual number; neither would Moſes in the place of Geneſis have ſaid the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Raphæi, or ſome other way fitteſt for perſpicuity; for this naming of both thus in the ſame clauſe, diſtinguiſheth one from the other.

* Becauſe Horn, when it is poliſhed, ſhineth; hence it is that the verb of this Noun is ſometime Lucere; as it were corneum eſſe: Whereupon the Vulgar Exod. 34. 29. reading cornuta corneam, or lucidam faciem, gave occaſion to the fabulous painters to paint Moſes with Horns. Judith. 1. 8. 1. Cant. 5.

Not far from Aſteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This City (ſaith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the Book of Judith, and there are that of this City underſtand David in his 120. Pſalm, and here the Sepulcher of Job is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is ſo that the Greek hath Galaad inſtead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth uſe in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Pſalm do rather prove that Cedar was not here about, than any way help Adrichomius. For that they ſpeak of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan; whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petræa, far from theſe parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding thoſe places) fain many things to abuſe the Chriſtians, and to get Money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the Hiſtorical Circumſtances of Job are ſo obſcure, that we ſhould rather by finding his Country ſeek to get ſome knowledge of him, than by any preſumptions founded upon him, infer what his Country was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of Job himſelf whether he were the ſame Jobab remembered in the ſame 36. of Geneſis, deſcended from Eſau, and King alſo of Idumæa, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaſter, and Bellarmine are of another Opinion, yet S. Ambroſe, Auguſtin, Chryſoſtome, and Gregory, with Athanaſius, Hyppolitus, Iræneus, Euſebius Emiſſenus, Apollinaris, Euſtachius and others, cited by S. Hierom in his 126. Epiſt. to Evagrius, take him for the ſame.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greek Ὡς, which the Septuagint uſe for the word Huts, tranſlated by the Vulgar ſometimes Hus, as Job. 1. v. 1. ſometime Auſitis, as Hierome 25. 20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palæſtina and Cœleſyria, beſides Chamatha (or Hamath) under Palmyrene in the Country called by Ptolomy, Trachonitis or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Baſan in this half Tribe of Manaſſes. And that this Land of Hus was thus ſeated it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jeremiah the 25. 20. where he reckons the Huſhites among the promiſcuous Borderers of the Iſraelites, whom he therefore calleth promiſcuous or miſcellaneam turbam, becauſe their bounds were not only joined but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Jeremiah, Lamentations 4 21. ſpeaking of the ſame Prophecy, of which he ſpeaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, muſt needs be expounded; as Junius reads them, diſtinguiſhing the Land of Hus from Edom: O Filia Edomi, ô quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwelleſt in the Land of Hus. Now becauſe the Vulgar doth not ſo diſtinguiſh, but readeth Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleſt in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it ſeems, ſome of the Learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have ſaid, and King of Edom, which if they underſtand by it Idumæa or Edom, ſo called in Moſes's time, they are greatly miſtaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumæa. For it is very probable that Eſau, when he firſt parted from Jacob, did not ſeat himſelf in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South Border of Judæa, but inhabited Seir far to the Eaſt of Jordan, and held a part of thoſe Mountains otherwiſe called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir, and from this his Habitation did Eſau incounter Jacob, when he returned out of Meſopotamia, who paſſed by the very border of Eſau his abiding. It is true, that at ſuch time as Moſes wandred in the Deſarts, that the poſterity of Eſau inhabited Seir to the South of Judæa: For it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did alſo drive the Edomites out of thoſe parts, who thence-forward ſeated themſelves to the South of Judæa, bordering the Deſart Paran, and ſtretched their Habitations over the Deſarts as far as Hor, where Aaron died.

For u and eu are often changed one into the other: whence they uſed Auſitis for Ouſitis, &c. Hence alſo by Junius and others it is called Auſanitis, & ſo as it ſeems they read it in the Septuagint. Junius in Gen 10. 23.

Deut. 3. 9.

Now

Now for this Hus which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the Son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the Son of Nachor, Abraham's Brother, the queſtion is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to think, that it was Hus the Son of Nachor; partly becauſe theſe Families of Aram ſeem long before to have been loſt; and partly becauſe in Job. c. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Jobs Friends, which ſeems to be of Jobs own Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz, the Brother of Hus, the Son of Nachor; as alſo Jeremiah 25. in the ſame Continuation (though ſome other Nations named between) where Hus is ſpoken of, there Buz is alſo named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job. 32 Elihu the Buzite is ſaid to be of the Family of Ram (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Family of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to underſtand Aram the Son of Shem, Junius himſelf maketh it plain, both in his Annotation upon the beginning of his Book, where he ſaith that one of Jobs Friends (which muſt needs be this Elihu) was of the poſterity of Nachor (as alſo in this place he confeſſeth ſo much expreſsly) and in as much as he readeth not è familia Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syra; like as elſewhere Laban who ſprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Auſitide.

As for the other three of Jobs Friends (of whom by this Note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or the Family of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other Kindreds; as alſo by the Septuagints Addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Auſitis, it is implied that they thought only Elihu to have been of Jobs own Country.

See Sixtus Senenſis.

Franciſcus Brochard the Monk, in his Deſcription of the Holy Land in the journey from Acon Eaſtward, findeth Suetha, and Themian on the Eaſt of the Sea of Galilee, both very near to the Land of Hus; whereof the one may ſeem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchit; the other Eliphaz the Themanite; two of the three Friends of Job, of the which Job 2. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchits were Inhabitants of Arabia the Deſart, deſcended of Shuach the Son of Abraham and Keturah; of whom Gen. 52. 2. perhaps, ſaith he, the ſame whom Pliny call Sacchæi. So alſo he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the Deſart; and Eliphaz himſelf to have been of the poſterity of Theman the Son of Eliphaz, which was the Son of Eſau. And ſo alſo Nahamah whence Tſophar the third of Jobs Friends (which in this place of Job c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the ſame Learned Expoſitor thought either to be named of Thimnah by Tranſpoſition of Letters (which Thimnah Gen. 36. 40. is named among the Sons of Eſau that gave Denomination to the places where they were ſeated) or elſe to be the ſame Nahamah, which Joſ. 15. 41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the Border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not, but that near to the Land of Hus, in Baſan, as it ſeems, in the Tribe of Manaſſes, there is a Region which at leaſt in latter times was called Suitis, or of ſome like name. For this is evident by the Hiſtory of Gulielmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diverſly) of exceeding great ſtrength and uſe for the retaining of the whole Country: Which in the time of Baldwin the ſecond King of Jeruſalem, was with great digging through Rocks recovered by the Chriſtians; having not long before been loſt to the great diſadvantage of the Country, while it was in the Hands of the Saracens. The Situation of this Fort is by Tyrius deſcribed to be ſixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the Eaſt of Jordan, by Adrichomius four miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazim. De Bell. Sacr. l. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manaſſes named in the Scripture are theſe; Golan, Beheſthera, Mitſpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Iſraelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitſpa of Gilehad, we have ſpoken by occaſion among the Cities of Gad. The two other were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of Refuge; from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis ſuperior & inferior, oft in Joſephus. Beheſthera is accounted the chief City of Baſan by ſome, but the Writers corrupting the Name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betſer or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Jerome hath Arga, a name of a City placed by ſome about the Waters of Merom (as they are called by Joſhua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Joſephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midſt between Cæſarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the Weſt. When the Snow of Libanus melteth it is very large, ſaith Brochard; otherwiſe more contract, leaving the marſh ground on both ſides, for Lyons and other wild Beaſts, which harbour in the Shrubs that plentifully grow there. Joſ. 21. 27. Deut. 4. 43.

Adjoining to this Lake in this Country of Manaſſes, Joſephus names two places of ſtrength fortified by himſelf in the beginning of the Jews Rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North ſide of this half Tribe of Manaſſe, and in the North-eaſt, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places toward Damaſcus, as Tſedad, Chauran, and Chatſar Henan, lying in a line drawn from the Weſt; of which three Cities we read Ezek. 47. 15. with which alſo agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, between Tſedad, and Chatſar Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the Name of Auranitis regio, in Joſephus and Tyrius, whoſe bounds (as alſo the bounds of Geſſur and Mahachath or Macati, which were likewiſe Borderers to Manaſſes towards the North-eaſt) are unknown; only that Geſſur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the Daughter of Tholmay King of Geſſur; by whom he had the moſt beautiful, but wicked, and unfortunate Abſalon. 1 Chron. 3. 2.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites, that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this Border, and of that part of the World, was the most famous, excelling in Beauty, Antiquity, and Riches, and was therefore called the City of Joy or Gladness, and the House of Pleasure; and is not only remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, Joseph. saith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hus l. 14. the Son of Aram; of which Opinion S. Jerome In Isai. 17. upon Isaiah seemeth to be; though in his Hebrew Questions he affirmeth that it was founded by Da- Gen. 15. 2. mascus, the Son of Eliezer Abraham's Steward, a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that Name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their King; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no Title at all or Right to that Principality: But David having overthrown Hadadezer King of Sophena, (otherwise Syria, Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder 1 Reg. 11. of that broken Army, invaded Damascena, and v. 40. possest Damascus it self, and became an Enemy to Solomon all his Life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edo- 1 Reg. 11. mite, who flying into Ægypt from David, and Joab, when they slew all the Males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Ægypt's Wives Sister, of whom Taphnes in Ægypt was so call'd. This Adad returning again became an Enemy to Solomon, all his Life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that Kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with Waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Parphar; whereof one of them Prophane 2 Reg 5. Writers call Chrysorrhoas, the Golden River. Junius takes it for Adonis. The Country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent Fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle built, as it seems, by the Florentines, after it became Christian: The Lillies being found Herold. 6. Bell. Sacr. cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Isai, Jeremy, and 1. 3. 8. 10. Zacharias, Prophesied that it should be taken, & 17. 49. burnt, demolished, and made a heap of Stones. & 9. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar invited by Achaz 2 Reg. 16. King of Judah, carried away the Naturals of Damascus into the East, leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Jerome upon Isai, which thing was performed by Salmanasar according to Juni- Isai. 17. us, in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophesie. In time it was restored by the Mace- Joseph. donians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Sy- ant. 4. ria fell into the Hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Jerome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the year of our Redemption 636. And in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of France, Baldwin the third King of Jerusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, Brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earl of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus; but being betrayed by the Syrians they failed of the Enterprize.

Vitri c. 46. Wil. Tyr. Bell. Sac. l. 17. c. 1. 23. 4. 5.

In the year 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatned extream torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place; but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the Son of Halon was by his Father made King thereof.

Herold. Bel. Sac. 4. c. 14.

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it and put all to the Sword, filling the Ditch with his Prisoners, those that retired into the Castle, which seem'd a place impregnable, he over-topp'd with another Castle adjoining; he forbore the demolishing of the City in respect of the Beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. Gates or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000. Lanthorns of Gold and Silver; but while he invaded Ægypt they again surprized Damascus. Lastly in his return after three Months Siege he forct it; the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired Mercy: But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their Houses, knew them not by the Foundations. And as a Trophey of his Victory he raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the Heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this it was restored and repossest by the Soldan of Ægypt, with a Garrison of Mammalukes. And in the Year 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Ægyptians; in whose Possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all Neighbouring Nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their Power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the Son of Aram, or by Damascus the Son of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Da- vids time. For it ſtood without the Bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moſes, Joſua, and Judges, as impertinent to that Story: But were it ſo that it had ſome Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of thoſe parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till ſuch time as David overthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba; the ſame Nation which Pliny calleth Nubæi, inhabiting be-Plin. l. 6. c. 28. tween Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to underſtand the Story of thoſe Syrian Princes, whom ſoon after the Kings of Damaſcus made their vaſſals, the Reader may inform himſelf, That on the North-eaſt parts of the holy Land there were three chief Principalities whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or diſturbed the State or Commonwealth of Iſrael, namely Damaſcus or

1 Sam. 14. 47. Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba, of which theſe were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Rezon or Rezon of Damaſcus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Toha of Chamath. But it ſeemeth that Damaſcus was one of the Citys ſubject to Adadezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made War againſt 3082. Zoba, Damaſcus was not named. And as Joſephus affirmeth the Leader of thoſe Succours, which were levied and ſent to Hadad Hezer from Damaſ-
2 Sam. 8. cus, had the Name of Adad: who was in that Battle ſlain with 22000. Aramites of Damaſcus; whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himſelf King of Damaſcus: Adadezer and
1 Reg. 11. Adad of Damaſcus being both ſlain. About the ſame time Toha King of Chamath or Ituræa, hearing that his Neighbour and Enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, ſendeth for Peace to David, and preſenteth him with rich Gifts, but in dolo ſaith St. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the Weſt of Damaſcus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited; but they for the moſt part were in League and Peace with the Judæans and Iſraelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damaſcena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Iturea, to which I may add Geſhur, becauſe it is ſo accounted in the 2. of Sam. 15. as joining in the Territory to Damaſcus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Paleſtina it ſelf is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract) It it not agreed among the Hiſtorians of former times, nor of our latter Writers, who was the firſt of thoſe Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damaſcus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the firſt of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab therein to deſtroy all the Male Children thereof: Adad of the Kings Seed, fled into Ægypt, and was there Married to Taphnes the Queens Siſter as before; who hearing of Davids death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he returned again, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damaſcus; and was the firſt of the Syrian Kings. To me it ſeemeth otherwiſe.
2 Sam. 8. 3. and 12. For as I take it, Adadezer the Son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principali-
1 Sam. 14. 47. ty; and the firſt of Adads, who forſaking his Fathers Name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the ſtile of Adad, the great God of the Aſſyrians, ſaith Macrobius, which ſignified Oneneſs or Unity. I alſo find a City called Adada in the ſame part of Syria: of which whether theſe Princes took the Name or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the ſame in Name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adjoyned. And that Adadezer was of greateſt power, it appeareth, firſt becauſe it is againſt him, that David undertook the War; Secondly becauſe he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damaſcus; as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damaſcens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his Name; Thirdly, becauſe Syria Zoba, of the moſt of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Deſart as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny, and the great-Plin. l. 6. c. 18. eſt part of Arabia Petræa according to Niger. Whoſoever was the firſt, whether Adadezer, or Adad
1 Reg. 11. of Idumæa, Rezon was the ſecond: Who was an Enemy to Iſrael all the days of Solomon. Beſides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, ſeemeth to be referred to Habad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Ægypt, to wit, 23. years after he was carried hither.

The third King of Damaſcus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion ſucceeded Tabrimmon, or Tibremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the firſt of Kings. For Aſa King of Juda,
1 King. 15. 18. the Son of Abiam, the Son of Roboam, the Son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baaſha, the Succeſſor of Nadab, the Son of Jeroboam, ſent to Benhadad, the Son of Tabrimmon the Son of Hezion King of Aram, that dwelt at Damaſcus, to invade Iſrael (while Baaſha ſought to fortifie Rama againſt Aſa; thereby to block him up, that he ſhould not enter into any of the Territories of Iſrael) who according to the deſire of Aſa, having received his Preſents, willingly invaded the Country of Napthalim, and took divers Cities, and ſpoils
1. Reg. 15. v. 18. thence: Aſa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baaſha had brought to fortifie Rama withal, and converted them to his own uſe.

This Benhadad's Father Tabremmon was in League with Aſa: and ſo was his Father Hezion; for Aſa requireth the continuance of that friendſhip from Benhadad, his Son; though it ſeemeth that the Gold and Silver ſent him out of the Temple, was the moſt forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Iſrael, before the enterprize of his Son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was priſoner with Achab, ſpoke as followeth. The City which my Father took from thy Father, I will reſtore; and thou ſhalt make Streets or
1 Reg. 20. v. 34. Keepers of the Borders, for thee in Damaſcus; as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariſeth a great doubt (if the Argument it ſelf were of much importance) becauſe Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baaſha, at the requeſt of Aſa. But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab; and was the ſecond time taken Priſoner, was rather the Son of Benhadad, the firſt of 1 Reg. 15. that name, the Confederate of Aſa and Abiam, as before, than the Son of Tabremmon. For between the Invaſion of Benhadad the firſt, in Baaſha's time, and the ſiege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there paſt 49. years, as may be gathered out of the Reigns of the Kings of Iſrael. So that if we allow 30. years of Age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baaſha, and after that 49. years, e're he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad, at ſuch an Age, would make War. Beſides all this, the firſt Benhadad came with no ſuch pomp, but the ſecond Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings; and therefore I reſolve that Benhadad the Son of Tabremmon invaded Baaſha and Omri, and Benhadad the ſecond invaded Achab, at whoſe Hands

this Benhadad received two notorious Overthrows; the first at Samaria, by a Sally of 700 Israelites; the second at Aphec, where with the like Number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 100000 of 1 Reg. 20. the Aramites, besides 27000, which were crusht by the Fall of the Wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at Liberty; to whom he rendreth those Towns, that his Father had taken from the Predecessor of Achab; but being returned, he refuseth to surrender Ramoth-Gilead, a Frontier Town, and of great Importance. Now three years after (for so long the League lasted)
1 Reg. 22. Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invadeth Gilead, and assiegeth the City, being assisted by Je- 3227. hosaphat. The Aramites came to succor and fight, 3232. in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night.
2 Reg. 5. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of
1 Reg. 6. his Forces, called Naaman, to Joram the Son of Achab, to be healed of the Leprosie; and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh Quarrel against Joram: And when Joram, by Elizeus his Intelligence, had escaped his Plot, he sent Men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid.
2 Reg. 6. After Benhadad besiegeth Samaria again; and be-
2 Reg. 7. ing terrified thence from Heaven, he departeth Home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great 3234. Gifts to Elizeus, to know his Estate, if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad, Adar, the Son of
Amo. 1. Adar: Amos and Jeremiah mention the Towers
Hier. 49. of Benhadad. Josephus writeth, that Benhadad and his Successor Azael, were worshipped for Gods, by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptu-
Ant. l. 8. c. 8. ous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their Antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce 1100 years are compleat, since their Wars with the Israelites.

Hazael, or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recover his present Fit of Sickness. He waged War with Joram, who received divers Wounds at the Encounter at Ramoth in Gilead; from whence returning to be cured at Jesrael, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the Death of Joram, Azael continued the War against Jehu, and wasted Gilead,
2 Reg. 12. 17. and all those Portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invadeth Juda, and took Gath; but by Gifts from Joas, he was averted from attempting Jerusalem: for he presented
2 Reg. 12. him with all the hallowed things which JEHOSAPHAT, JEHORAM, and AHAZIAH, his Fathers, Kings of Juda had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated; and all the Gold which was found in the Treasuries of the Lord, and in the King's House. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled, to please the Adads of Damascus: For Asa did present Benhadad with those Treasures, when he invited him to war upon
1 Reg. 15. Baasha, King of Israel. And notwithstanding this Composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judæa, and slaughtered many principal Persons.
2 Kings 13. v. 7. Lastly, Azael vexed Joahas the Son of Jehu, and brought him to that Extremity, as he left him but Fifty Horsemen, Ten Chariots, and Ten Thousand Footmen of all his People.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and Decay and Overthrow of their Power.

After Hazael, Benhadad the Second, or rather the Third of that Name, the Son of Hazael reigned in Damascus, who fought against Israel with ill Success: For Joas, King of Israel, 2 Reg. 13. the Son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in Josep. Ant. three several Battels; and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz. c. 9.

Afterward this Benhadad, the Son of Hazael, Josep. Ant. there succeeded three others of the same Name, l. 7. c. 6. of whom the Stories are lost; only Nicholaus Damascenus, cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: And in one of these King's Times it was, that Jeroboam the Second, the Son of Joas, re- 2 King. 14. covered Damascus it self, to Judah, saith the Ge- 28. neva; but better in Junius, utque recuperabat Damascum, & Camatham Jehudæ, pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus, and Camatha of Judæa: For these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this Conquest upon the Adads was performed; the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad, the Son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his Son Jeroboam the Second: It seemeth, that this Jeroboam, without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprise, instantly followed his Father's good Fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason the 10*th*. Adad, maketh League with Pekah, or Phacas, King of Israel, against Achaz, King of Juda: Both carry away a great number of Prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Jerusalem; but in vain. Then Adad alone in- 2 Kings vadeth Elath; and beating out the Jews, maketh 16. 5. it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Es. 7. Tetglaphalassar against Razin, who took him, and Josep. Ant. beheaded him, and won Damascus; with whom lib. 9. c. 12. ended the Line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus; the Assyrians becoming Masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order, are thus reckoned:

1. Adadezer, the Son of Rehob.
2. Rezin, the Son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hezion.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Benhadad, who invaded Baasha.
6. Benhadad the Second, taken Prisoner by Achab.
7. Hazael, whom Elisha foretold with Tears, of his Advancement; the same who overthrew Joram, King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael, which preceded Benhadad the Third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Gath, and compounded the War with Joas, made the Expedition thirty Years, and perhaps more, after the first Hazael, which stifled his Master Benhadad, and had slain Joram the Son of Achab, King of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the seventh Year of Jehu, King of Israel; and after he had reigned twenty three Years, the Temple was not yet repaired;

after

after which (and how long we know not) it is said, that Hazael took Geth, and turned his Face towards Jerusalem. It is also some Proof, that Hazael which took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time but be of good Years, being, as it seemeth, the Second Person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadad's Men of War. To which Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded,

8. Benhadad the Third, who Joash, King of Israel, thrice overthrew.

9. Resin, or Rezin the last, who joyned with Pekah, King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz, King of Juda, waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the Third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes, of Syria, which were 2 Sam. 8. 9 but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we find that Toha was King of Emath, or Chamath in David's time, to whom he sent his Son Joram with Isa. 37. Presents, after David's Victory against Adadezer. Also Sennacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but nameth him not.

§ IV.

Of other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two Kings named, to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur. To Talmai, whose Daughter David married, it was that Absalom fled, who was his Maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena, or Syria, Soba, or Cœlosyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rochob, the the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himself; and it is plain, that after his Death, the Seat of the Kings of Soba, was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their Greatness. After, Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the Race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces, into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Abaz King of Juda, waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah, King of Israel, and against Rezin, the last King of Damascus; which Teglath first invading Damascena, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self; and did put to Death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants Captive. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel: For first, Phul Belochus entered the Borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who stop'd the Enterprize of Phul, with a thousand Talents of Silver: For this Phul Belochus, whose Pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm as yet in his Seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his Companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus; having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the Composition of a thousand Talents of the King of Israel, for that present time. But his Son Teglath, following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the War begun between Israel and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his Neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that War, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz, King of Juda, his Impresst and Entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his Path towards Israel, he carried it (as before remembred) and then with great Ease possest himself of the Cities of Nephthalim, leading with him a great part of the People Captive. And his Son Salmanassar, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabonassar, after the Revolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdom asunder. So as the Line and Race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the Race and Monarchy of Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Tiglath slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanassar overturned, happened near about a time; that of Ninus in the days of Belochus, and the other two in the days of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his Son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ossa ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Sennacherib, the Son of Salmanassar, in vain, and preserved for the time by God, miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Jerusalem and the Temple burnt, an hundred thirty two years after the Captivity of Israel and Samaria; the Destruction of Israel being in the ninth Year of Hosea; that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechiah. Now the Emperors of Assyria and Babylon, held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus; in all 3603.
about two hundred Years. After these, the Per- 3811.
sians, from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about two hundred Years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire; and his Successors the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became subject to the Power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in Possession of the Turk, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in War and Peace, being the only People, whose History in those antient Times, carried an assured Face of Truth.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Jeruſalem.

§ I.

Of divers memorable Places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mitſpa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the Twelfth and youngeſt Son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were muſtered at Mount Sinai, Thirty five thouſand able Bodies; all which periſhing in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Iſſues, Forty five thouſand ſix hundred, fit to bear Arms: And theſe had their Territory on this ſide Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim. The Cities within this Tribe, neareſt Jordan, are Lod, Hadid and Ono; of which Lod and Ono were built by Shemed, a Benjamite: They were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the Return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehemiah 11. 35. and Eſdras 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes beſides Hadid in Nehemiah, a City called Lodhadid. This Hadid, or Chadid, was rebuilt by Simon Maccbabæus.

Macc. 12. 38.

Samarim, or Tſemaraim, named of Tſemary, one of the Sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land ſtandeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies, and the laſt of Juda; ſeated in a moſt fruitful Valley, adorned with many Palm trees; and therefore elſewhere called the City of Palms. From the Time of Joſhua, who utterly deſtroyed it, it lay waſte until the Time of Achab; in whoſe days Chiel of Bethel laid the new Foundation of it, in the Loſs of Abiram his Eldeſt Son, and built the Gates of it in the Loſs of his youngeſt Son Segub, according to the Curſe of Joſhua; in which, and other reſpects, Hoſea 12. 14. calleth Joſhua a Prophet. In after-times it was deſtroyed by Veſpaſian, and re-built by Adrian.

* 1 Chron. 6. 60. This Halmon is called Halemeth, whence they make a new City Almath, as if this Tribe had given five Cities to the Levites

To the South eaſt of Jericho, ſtood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Joſ. 21. 18. To the South, Betharaba, of which Joſ. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal, of which there is ſo much mention in the Scripture, where Joſhua firſt eat of the Fruits of the Land; circumciſed all thoſe born in the Deſarts, and celebrated the Paſſeover.

The Reaſon of the Name, or rather a memorable Application of the Etymology of this Name, (for it ſeems by the place Deut. 11. 30. that the Name was known before the coming of the Iſraelites into Canaan) is noted Jo. 5. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Ægytiaci, becauſe their Fore-skins (the People being there circumciſed) were tumbled down the Hill; which from thence was called Collis Præputiorum. This Gilgal was alſo called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Joſ. 15. 7. & 18. 17. For it was in the Borders of Jordan, of which Joſ. 22. 13. and Geliloth ſignifieth Borders. It ſtood (though in ſome diſtance) directly Eaſtward, over againſt the two Hills, Garizim and Hebal; upon the one of which the Bleſſings, and on the other the Curſings were to be read to the People, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the Scituation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitſpa of Benjamin (of which alſo we read oft in the Scripture) were ſeated about the midſt of the length of the Land of Canaan; For which reaſon Samuel choſe theſe two places, to either of which he came yearly to give Judgment to the Iſraelites; of which two (Gilgal as is ſaid) was near Jordan on the Eaſt ſide of this Tribe; and Mitſpa near the Weſt Sea, towards the Land of the Philiſtims.

Deut. 11. 30.

1 Sam. 7. 15.

The Third place, which is named with theſe two, whither alſo Samuel uſed yearly to come, is † Bethel; which alſo was ſeated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal which was the firſt place, where the Ark reſided, after they paſt over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jeharim, and at length to Jeruſalem) here in Gilgal it was that Joſua pitched up the twelve ſtones, which were taken out of the Channel of Jordan when it was dry, that the Iſraelites might paſs over it; by which Story, as it is ſet down Joſ. 4. it appears, that the ſame day that they paſſed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the ſame Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitſpa, whither alſo Samuel came yearly to give Judgment, there alſo were often the greateſt meetings held, as that for the revenge of the Levites wife againſt Gibha, and the Benjamites, Jud. 20. 1. and another againſt the Philiſtims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither alſo Judas Macchabæus gathered the Jews (when Jeruſalem was poſſeſt by the Heathen) as it is 1 Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reaſon of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationi fuerat Mitſpæ antea Iſraeli. Touching this Mitſpa, to avoid confuſion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitſpa of Juda, of which Joſ. 15. 38. * Mitſpa of Gilead, of which we have ſpoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitſpa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himſelf, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and laſtly, this chief Mitſpa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief Meetings were held, both before Jeruſalem was recovered from the Jebuſites, and alſo in the time of the Maccabees (as we have ſaid) when Jeruſalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, ſo alſo in the time of Jeremy, after the deſtruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah, whom Nabuchodonoſor left in Jewry, as Governor over thoſe that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place; untill (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was ſlain by the Treaſon of Iſmael, one of the Royal Blood of Juda, as it is Jeremiah 14.

† Junius in this place, for Bethel, reads Domum Dei fortis, and interprets it, Kiriath-jeharim, where the Ark abode: For (ſaith he) by the Law, Exod. 23. 17. the greateſt Meetings in their annual Feaſts, were to be where the Ark was; but this place doth not ſpeak of feſtival, but of judicial meetings: And beſides, the Prieſts did uſe to bring the Ark to their great Meetings, whereſoever they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12. v. 1. & c. 14. v. 18. neither is it eaſie to expound Bethel, otherwiſe than for the City Bethel, tho' Junius alſo takes it for the place where the Ark was, 1 Sam. 10. 3.

* It was no other than this Mitſpa of Gilead, of which Joſ. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Verſus Orientem: For Joſhua notes the three quarters North, Weſt and Eaſt, to which he followed the Canaanites; though Adrichomius, and others, out of this place, imagine a Mitſpa, or Maſpha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Aſſer.

Near unto this Mitſpa ‖ the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezar, that is, the ſtone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophy againſt the Philiſtims. ‖ 1 Sam. 7. 11.

Touch-

Touching Bethel, which (as it ſeems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief Meetings for the miniſtring of Juſtice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the Iſſue of Joſeph (though it belonged to the Portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehemiah 11. 31. and Joſhuah 18. 22.) and how another City called * Luz, near adjoyning to it, was built by the Man of the City, which ſhewed the Entrance to the Spies, as it is Judges 1. and of the occaſion of the Name from Jacob's Viſion; and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his Calves here, of Bethel (which ſignifieth the Houſe of God) made it (a) Beth-aven, that is, the Houſe of Vanity, Hoſ. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as alſo other memorable things of this place; they are ſo well known out of the Hiſtories of the Scripture, that we may well paſs them over.

* Joſ. 16. 2.

(a) Borrowing the name of a neighbour Town in the Confines of the Kingdoms of Juda and Iſrael, between Hai and Bethel, Joſ. 7. 2. and 18. 12.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the firſt belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great Victory of Abia againſt Jeroboam (of which 2 Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adjoyned to the Kingdom of Juda; and ſo it continued, as appears by the Story of Joſiah, which performed the Propheſies againſt the Altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence thoſe Coaſts, 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Aphærema, which Greek Word ſignifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Præfectures which Demetrius, in his Epiſtle mentioneth, as added by him to the Ditio of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Countrey. A part of it, as appears, 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephrævin, which Joſ. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibha and Gebah. Of the Name Rama, (b) it is noted already in the Deſcription of Ephraim, that there were many Towns ſo called, becauſe of their high Scituation: But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it ſeems, becauſe Matthew 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and alſo out of Brochard and Breidenbach, make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; and theſe three have no Warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama, in the Tribe of Aſſer, as it ſeems, we have Teſtimony, Joſ. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Joſ. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Samuel 25. 1. which more often is called (c) Ramatha, and 1 Samuel 1. 1. Ramathaim Tſophim; for which the Septuagint have Aramathaim-ſophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joſeph of Arimathea, Matthew 27. 57. was denominated.

(b) See c. 9. § 1.

(c) Of this Ramatha, I underſtand the place, 1 Macc. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three Præfectures, which Demetrius yields to the Jews out of the Country of Samaria; this lying toward the Eaſt to Jericho, and Juda toward the Weſt; and Apharema (of which even now we ſpake) lying in the midſt, between the two other. A ſixth Rama it ſeems there was in the Tribe of Simeon, toward the South, and which Joſ. 19. 8. 7. called Ramah of the South, and otherwiſe Baalath-beer.

Of a fourth Rama, we read 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilehad. The firſt, which is moſt often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, ſeated, as we ſaid, near Bethel, the uttermoſt South-border of the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes; for which Cauſe Baaſha, in the time of Aſa, King of Juda fortified it, to hinder thoſe that did fly from him to Aſa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I ſhould rather think that Joſeph was, that buried Chriſt, becauſe it was nearer to Jeruſalem, and after the Captivity belonged to Juda, as it appears, Eſd. 2. 26. where in that it is joyned with Gebah, it is plain, that he ſpeaketh of that Rama, with whoſe Stones (after Baaſha had ceaſed to build it) Aſa (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adjoyning to it, both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South border of the Ten Tribes, ſo was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda; whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read, that Joſiah, through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North border to Beer ſheba, which was the South-border, deſtroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibha, which was the City of Saul (the Wickedneſs of which City, in the time of the Judges, had almoſt utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently diſtinguiſhed, Iſaiah 10. 27. of which word (d) Gibha, in another form Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The Vicinity of this City alſo to Rama of Benjamin, appears, Jude 19. 13. where the Levite with his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his Lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1 Samuel 22. 6. it ſeems, that there was in this Gibha ſome Tower or Cittadel, called Rama, where Junius reads, in excelſo, for in Rama: but it may be, that the Name of the King's Palace in this City was Rama, (for this word is oft-times an Appellative, ſignifying a Hill) but as it ſeems, that in Rama of Samuel, the Naem of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great City of Hai, overthrown by Joſhua, which Joſ. 7. 2. is placed near Beth-aven, upon the Eaſt of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved, Nehemiah 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Joſhua, chap. 18. for it was burned by him, and laid deſolate, as it is, Joſhua 8. 28. In ſolitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief Note, reckoned, Joſhua 18. 25. in this Tribe, was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hivites, whoſe Cunning, to bind the Iſraelites by Oath to ſave their Lives, is ſet down, Joſhua 9. whence they were reckoned among the Nethinæi, or Proſelites, and were bound to certain publick Services in the Houſe of God; which Oath of ſaving theſe Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God puniſhed by a Famine, 2 Samuel 21. 1. This Gibeon, or Gibbon, with Almon and Jebab (of both which we have ſpoken) and with Hanothoth, the Natal Place of Jeremiah the Prophet, were ſaid, Joſhua 21. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1 Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Prieſt, which was of Nob, before it was deſtroyed by Saul, is ſent to his Grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Nehemiah 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul, the reſiding place of the Ark was in Kiriath jearim, yet by the lamentable Tragedy of Blood ſhed, which Saul raiſed in this place (as it is ſet down, 1 Samuel 21, and 22.) in the Judgment of Junius, it is proved, that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

(d) Gibha in conſtruction, that is, governing a Genitive Caſe, is Gibbath, whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read, Joſ. 24. 33. Gabaath Phinees; for which Junius hath Collis Phincaſi. Hill) but this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoyned, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

Micmas alſo in this Tribe, Nehemiah 9. 31. was a place of Fame, of which Iſaiah 10. 28. where alſo he nameth Gallim and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his Camp, 1 Samuel 13. 2. (when he left Gibha to Jonathan) and there alſo was Jonathan Maccabæus his Abode, 1 Mac. 9. 73. Of Giſcala in Galilee, Joſephus often maketh mention; but of any here in Benjamin, which

The word Nethinim, or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were à Deo dati;) or as Junius expounds it, dedititii is uſed, 1 Chron. 9. 2. and in Eſdras and Nehemiah often.

they make the Natal Place of St. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his Parents to Tharsis: Of this I find no good Warrant. Other places of less Importance I omit, and come to the City of Jerusalem, and the Princes and Governors of this City; a great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence, Joshua 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§ II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jerusalem.

AT what time Jerusalem was built (which afterward became the Princess of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are, who imagine, that Melchisedec was the Founder thereof in Abraham's Time. But according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the Overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captains, when Lot was made Prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse, bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greeks, Solima.

See in the hither half of Manasse.

Hierusalem, (whensoever, or by whom built) was a Principal City in Joshua his Time; yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those Days, and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedeck (whom Joshua slew) was then King of Jerusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: For how long soever they held it before Moses his Time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost four hundred Years after him, even till David wan it; and therefore in all likelyhood, it was by the Jebusæi (the Children of Jebusæus, the Son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation relie on the Strength of the Place, as when David attempted it, they bragged, that their Lame, and Blind, and impotent People should defend it.

2 Sam. 5. v. 6.

David, after he had, by God's Assistance, possest it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great Encrease of Circuit; strengthened it with a Cittadel or Castle, and beautified it with many Palaces, and other Buildings, changing the Name from Jebusalem, the City of the Jebusites, to Jerusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolima. After David's Time, Solomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly: For, besides the Work of the Temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all Nations; the Palaces, Gates and Walls, could not any where in the World be exampled: And besides that it had an Hundred and fifty thousand Inhabitants, the Women and Children not accounted. The Ditch had Sixty Foot of Depth, cut out of the very Rock, and Two hundred and fifty Foot of Breadth, whereof the like hath seldom been heard of either since or before.

Jos. cont. App. l. 1. Strabo Geog. l. 16.

After the Death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishac, King of Ægypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumæan, and Jeroboam, Solomon's Servant; and both married to Ægyptians; the State by the one disturb'd, by the other broken, Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entred Jerusalem, and Sackt it; and became Master, not only of the Riches of Solomon, but of all those Spoils which David had gotten from Adadezer, Toha, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sackt, and a part of the Wall thrown down by Joas King of Israel, while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

2 Chron. 12.

2 King. 14.

2 King. 14.

Not long after, Achaz, the Fifteenth King of Juda, impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglathphalassar with the Treasures thereof. And Manasse, the Son of Ezekiah, the Son of Achaz, by the Vaunts made by Ezekiah to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the Remain, and the very Bottom of their Treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Joakim then reigning. But this ungrateful, idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these God's gentle Corrections and Afflictions; but persisting in all kind of Impiety, filling the City even to the Mouth with innocent Blood, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchadonosor, as his Scourge and Revenger, who making this Glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls, and Towers which embraced them, even and level with the Dust, carried away the Spoils with the Princes and People, and crusht them with the heavy Yoak of Bondage and Servitude full seventy years; insomuch, as Sion was not only become as a torn, and plowed up Field, Jerusalem a Heap of Stone and Rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a Grove, or Wood of Thorns and Briars; but (as Hierom speaketh) even the Birds of the Air scorned to fly over it, or the Beasts to tread on that defiled Soil.

Then seventy Years being expired, according to the Prophesie of Daniel, and the Jews, by the Grace of Cyrus, returned, the Temple was again built, though with Interruption and Difficulty enough, and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls, or other Defences, for some Sixty and odd Years, till Nehemiah, by the Favour of Artaxerxes, rebuilt them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes; after, by * Ptolomæus the First; then by Antiochus Epiphanes; and again by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed; though Crassus in his Parthian Expedition, took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

* The first of the Ægyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who dissembling his Religion, came up to Jerusalem to offer Sacrifice. Jos. 12. an. 1.

But the Damages which it sustained by the Violence of Sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the Industry or Bounty of good Princes, the voluntary Contribution of the People, and the Liberality of Strangers. Before the Captivity, the People of the Land, through the Exhortation of Godly Kings, made many and large Offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The Wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the Bounty of his Son Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The Mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes, and his Followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Jerusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the Losses, which either the City, or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the Reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple; and with many sumptuous Works, did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious, than they had been in the Days of Solomon.

§ III.

Of the Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing Estate, it was, at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus; and after his Death and Ascension it so continued about fourty Years: But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred up, by God, to be the Revenger of Christ his Death, and to punish the Jews sinful Ingratitude, encompass it with the Roman Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the Siege at such time as the Jews, from all parts, were come to the Celebration of the Passeover; so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts, and no manner of Provision or Store for any such Multitudes. An extream Famine, with the Civil Dissention, oppresst them within the Walls; a forcible Enemy assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the Destruction of the Jews Kingdom, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it, who also burnt the Temple, when Nebuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the Consummation of the Victory, Eleven hundred thousand Souls; and the City was so beaten down, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the Desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such Place or Habitation: Only the three Herodian Towers (Works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for Lodgings for the Roman Garrisons, as that thereby their Victory might be the more Notorious and Famous: For by those Buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might Judge what the rest were; and their Honour be the greater and more shining that thereover became Victorious.

Esd. 1. c. 4. v. 45.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judæa, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at Peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State; but after Sixty Five years, when they again offered to Revolt, and Rebel, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many Thousands of them, and overturned those Three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there shall not stand one Stone upon another, of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his Fury was appeased, and the Prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great Capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the Gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set in the Front thereof, which he did in despight of the Jews Nation; making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it, from any other high place overtopping it.

Gul. Tir. Bel. Sa. l. 14. c. 12.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

Onuphrius Chro.

It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Ægyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd years.

In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bouillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when he was Elected King thereof, refused to be Crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein Crowned with Thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey Eighty Eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladin of Ægypt: And lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim; the Turks cast out the Ægyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumobarec, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone, that hath so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several Times and Ages, suffered the same Shipwrack. And it hath been Gods just Will, to the end others might take Warning, if they would; not only to Punish the impiety of Men, by Famine, by the Sword, by Fire, and by Slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possest; of the Walls and Building, yea of the Soil, and the Beasts that fed thereon.

G. Tir. l. 8. c. 5. 18, 19, &c.

For, even that Land, sometime called Holy, hath in effect, lost all her Fertility, and Fruitfulness; Witness the many Hundreds of Thousands, which it fed in the days of the Kings of Juda and Israel; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding Stony and Barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with Fire from Heaven, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very Soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the Hand of God to this day. God would not spare the Beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them, to be Sacrificed to himself; neither was it enough that Achan himself was Stoned, but that his Moveables were also consumed and brought to Ashes.

§ IV.

Of the Vain and Malicious Reports of Heathen Writers, touching the Ancient Jews.

OF the Original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversely and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Ægyptians. Others affirm that while Isis Governed Ægypt, the people were so increased, as Jerosolymus, and Judas led thence a great Multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the Neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the Waters. But Justin, of all other most Malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first; and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had Ten Sons, among whom he divided the Land of Juda; so called of Judas his Eldest, who had the greatest Portion. The youngest of the Sons of Israel he calleth Joseph; who being brought up in Ægypt, became Learned in Magical Arts, and in the Interpretations of Dreams, and Signs prodigious, and this Joseph (saith he) was Father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul Diseases, and least they ſhould infect others, were Baniſhed Ægypt. Further, he telleth how theſe Men thus Baniſhed, when in the Deſarts they ſuffered extream Thirſt and Famine, and therein found relief the Seventh day; for this cauſe ever after obſerved the Seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themſelves, which afterward became a Branch of their Religion. He addeth alſo, that they might not Marry out of their own Tribes, leaſt diſcovering their uncleanneſs, they might alſo be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Ægyptians. Theſe and ſuch like Fables hath Juſtin.

Cornelius Tacitus, doth as groſly belye them in affirming, That in the inmoſt Oratory of their Temple, they had the Golden Head of an Aſs, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himſelf, having in the fifth Book of his own Hiſtory truly confeſſed of the Jews, that they Worſhipped one only God: And thought it moſt prophane to repreſent the Deity by any Material Figure, by the ſhape of a Man, or any other Creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or Repreſentation, no not ſo much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhiſtor, in Stephanus; who alſo makes Judas with Idumæa, the firſt Parents of the Jews.

Cited by Stephanus in Judæa.

Claudius Iolaus draws them from Judæus, whoſe Parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans, or Lacedæmonians, challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as deſcended of Abraham, ſaith Joſephus. Some of theſe reports ſeem to have been gathered out of divine Letters; though wreſted and perverted, according to the Cuſtom of the Heathen. For ſo have they obſcured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradiſe, of the Flood; and given new Names to the Children of Adam in the firſt Age; to Noah and his Sons, in the Second; and ſo to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, Moſes, and the reſt of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews; all which fainings, as touching the Jews and their Originals, Joſephus againſt Appion, and Tertullian have ſufficiently anſwered. For that the Hebrews were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: And ſo Chaldæans Originally, taking name either of Heber, the Son of Sale, or elſe (ſaith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from Abrabon; having miſtaken the name of Abraham, who was the Son of Heber, in the Sixth deſcent. Their ancient Names were firſt changed by the two Grand-Children of Abram; for after Jacob, otherwiſe Iſrael, the chief part were called Iſrael, another part after Eſau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being moſt of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the Name of Judas, the Son of Jacob, and became Judæans or Jews; as alſo for a time in the Name of Ephraim the Son of Joſeph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the Ten Tribes; the reſt of the Ten Tribes were comprehended, but were firſt rooted out when the Kingdom of Iſrael fell. The Judæans continued their Names, though they ſuffered the ſame Servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonoſor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The Government which this Nation underwent, was Firſt paternal: which continued till they ſerved the Ægyptians. They were Secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moſes and Joſhua, by a Policy Divine. Thirdly, they ſubjected themſelves to Judges. Fourthly, they deſired a King, and had Saul for the firſt: Of whom and his Succeſſours, before we intreat, we are firſt to ſpeak of their Government under Judges, after the death of Joſhua; with ſomewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about theſe times

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the Death of Joſhua, to the War of Troy; which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-Regnum after Joſhua's Death: and of Othoniel.

WHEN Joſhua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the High Prieſt, held Authority over the People, and ordered that Common-Wealth: It pleaſed God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward eſtabliſhed) to undertake the War againſt the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the aſſiſtance of Simeon) they became Victorious.

In the firſt attempt which they made, they not only ſlew ten thouſand, but made Adonibezek Priſoner; the Greateſt and Cruelleſt Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This Tyrants Cruelty, as elſewhere hath been ſignified, they returned in the ſame kind upon his own head: and ſo by the Torments which he now felt in his own perſon (before no otherwiſe known unto him, but by his malitious imagination) made him confeſs and acknowledge Gods juſt Judgment againſt himſelf.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did alſo maſter and poſſeſs, during this Inter-regnum (or as ſome think, before the death of Joſhua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron, and Jeruſalem, which they burnt, and the Iebuſites afterward re-edified. They took alſo the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathſepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not ſet down in expreſs words, that any one Perſon commanded in Chief over the people, as Moſes and Joſhua did; yet it ſeemeth that Caleb was of greateſt Anthority amongſt them, and that he with the advice of Phinees directed and ordered their Wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good ſucceſs which followed their undertakings witneſſeth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Joſhua Governed, as appears Joſ. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the reſt of the Captains; for the performance of which enterprize, he promiſed his Daughter Achſah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger Brother ther after the conquest: whose behaviour in that Service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest Reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his Preferment and Election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made War with their Borderers, from whom they only recovered the Mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to inlarge and establish their own Territories; in which War they laboured with variable Success: for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries; and forc't them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites unmindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously afore-time defended them, and made them Victorious over their Enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Interregnum) did not only joyn themselves in Marriage with the Heathen Nations; but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead Gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia; whom Chushan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his People, and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader; who by God assisted, delivered his Brethren from oppression, and inforc't the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoyning; after which the Israelites had peace Forty years, during all the time of Othoniel's Government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to have been the younger Brother of Caleb, for as much as in the Book of Judges he is twice called Othoniel the Son of Cenaz. Calebs younger Brother. Others do rather interpret those Words (Calebs younger Brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should Marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore, that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the Kindred. Wherefore we may better think, that he was the Nephew of Caleb (as some learned men expound it) and as the very Words of Scripture seem to inforce. For Caleb was the Son of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the Son of Cenaz, Calebs younger Brother; that is, he was not Brother to Caleb, but his younger Brothers Son; to whom it was not only lawful, but commendable to Marry with his Cousin German Calebs Daughter.

How long it was from the Death of Joshua, to the Government of Othoniel, it cannot be found; but it seems to have been no short time: For many Wars were made in that space against the People of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of Opinion, that between the times of Jeshua and Othoniel, that Civil-War broke out, between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel; for the forcing to Death of the Levite's Wife. For it is written, that in those Days there was no King in Israel, but every Man did that which was good in his own Eyes. And as Juda led the People against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to have been when Joshua was Dead, and before the Government of Othoniel; especially, considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such Oppression of Strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attended such a Civil-War; if their Power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this Action, wherein they so weakned the Body of their Estate, by Effusion of Blood, that in many Ages, they could not bring into the Field such numbers, as formerly they had Mustered against their Bordering Enemies.

Jud. 17, 18, and 19.

§. II.

Of the Memorable things of this Age, in other Nations; and of the difficulty in the Computation of times.

THere lived in this Age of Othoniel, Pandion, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the Fifth King of Athens; who began to Rule in the Twentieth Year of Othoniel, and Governed Forty Years. He was Father to Erictheus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in Fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes; of whose Daughter Semele was Born, Dionysius or Liber Pater; under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this Age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubal-Cain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus Governed Thebes; whom divers Chronologers find in Ehud's time. But St. Augustine making a Repetition of these Fables, which were devised among the Grecians, and other Nations, during the Government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose Parentage there is a little Agreement. Vives upon the Thirteenth Chapter of St. Augustine de Civitate Dei, and the Eighteenth Book, hath gathered all the Opinions of this Man's Progeny, where he that desires his Pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him Native of Attica: and the Son of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius, by careful Industry, had fed the People of that Territory, in the time of a great Famine. This, when upon the like Occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the People, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow an Engraven or Carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return, and to relieve his People with Corn, from some Neighbour Nation; it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the Air.

Gen. 4. 22. Whence came the Name of Vulcan by Apheresis of the two first Letters. Aug. de civit. Dei l. 18 c. 13.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the Judges, and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which, would require the whole time of a long Life; and therefore, I desire to be excused, if in these Comparisons I err with others of better Judgement. For whether Eusebius, and all that follow him, or his Opposites (who made themselves so Conversant with these Ancient Kings, and with the very Year when they began to Rule) have have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off, and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the Ancientest Chronologers have borrowed Light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but Conjecture: Secondly, because their own Disagreement and Contention in those elder Days, with that of our own Age among the Labourers in times, is such, as no Man among them hath yet so edified any Man's Understanding, save his own, but that he is greatly distracted, after what Pattern to erect his Buildings.

This Disagreement is found not only in the Reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in Computation of those times, which the indisputable Authority of Holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abraham's Birth; and after in the times of the Judges, and the Oppressions of Israel, in the times from the Egression, to the Building of Solomon's Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventy Weeks; and in what not? Whersoever the account of times may suffer Examination, the Arguments are opposite, and Contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many ways to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the Clouds more condenst than before, I can therefore give no other warrant, than other Men have done in these Computations; and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise, than as a borrowed Knowledge, or at least a private Opinion; which I submit to better Judgements. Nam in Priscis rebus Veritas non ad Unguem quærenda. In Ancient things we are not to require an exact Narration of the Truth, says Diodore.

§. III

Of Ehud's time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

After the Death of Othoniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and suppress them; to perform which, he joined the Forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and so (as all kind of Misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his Grace and his Displeasure) these Heathen Neighbouring Nations, had an easie Conquest over Israel; whom God himself exposed to those Perils; within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable Estate they continued full Eighteen Years, under Eglon King of the Moabites, and his Confederates. Yet as the Mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his Ears from their crying Repentance; but raised up Ehud the Son of Gera to deliver them; by which weak Man, though maimed in his Right-hand, yet confident in the Justness of his Quarrel; and fearing that the Israelites, were too few in numbers, to contend with the Head of those Valiant Nations; he resolved to attempt upon the Person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following Victory; especially giving his Nation no time to re establish their Government, or to choose a King to command, and direct them in the Wars. According to which Resolution, Ehud went on as an Ambassador to Eglon, loaden with Presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private Access upon the pretence of some Secret to be revealed; he pierced his Body with a Poniard, made of purpose, with a double Edge; and shutting the Doors of his Closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army consisting of 10000. able and strong Men; whereof not any one escaped. After which Victory, and that Samgar his Successor had miraculously slain 600. Philistines with an Oxe Goad; the Land and People of Israel lived in Peace, unto the end of fourscore Years, from the Death of Othoniel; which term expired in the Worlds Year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her Husband, and with her two Sons, travelled into Moab; and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the Fourscore Years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather Flowers in the Fields of Hipponium in Sicilia; or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephisus, which elsewhere he calleth Cheuer, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joined themselves, they agreed together to recover her; but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tore him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him; and by strength took and mastered the Dog Cerberus; whereof grew the Fable of Hercules his delivering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this story, somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the Mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a general Name also for all fair Women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidoneus, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principal in this Conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of Affection or Inforcement, the one was given for Food to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held Prisoner; till Hercules by the Instigation of Euristhеus delivered him by a strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a People of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus; of which Mountains, Oeta is one of the most Famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessaly; but these are Neighbours to the Cassiopæi, saith Plutarch in his Greek Questions.

Paus. in Att.

The Rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erictheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the Fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having Married her Sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her Sister, forc't her in the passage, and withal cut out her Tongue that she might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way; all which her Brother-in-law's mercilesse Behaviour towards wards her, Philomela expreſſed by her Needle upon Cloth, and ſent it Progne. In revenge whereof Progne cauſed her only Son Itys to be cut in pieces, and ſet before Tereus her Husband, ſo dreſt as it appeared to be ſome ordinary Food; of which when he had eaten his fill, ſhe cauſed his Head, Hands, and Feet, to be preſented unto him; and then fled away with ſuch ſpeed towards Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets fained, that ſhe was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis; and the Tomb of Tereus, Pauſanias hath built near the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as alſo by the Name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to have been done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his Peloponneſian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſæ, (as the Poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians; of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion to have amity with his Neighbours, made him his Son in law; as it is good to believe, ſaith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens, made that Alliance with a Neighbour King from whom he might have ſuccour, rather than with any Tereus, that ſhould have held the Kingdom of Odryſæ, which was greatly diſtant from thence. The occaſion that the Poets choſe a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may ſeem to have been, partly becauſe, as Pauſanias ſays: Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; As if a Swallow remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and to her Siſter, did for ever hate that place.

Thuc. l. 2.

Near this time Melampus (who is ſaid to have underſtood the voices of Birds and Beaſts) flouriſhed, being alſo eſteemed for an excellent Phyſician. He reſtored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets pleaſe) were made Mad by Juno; and thinking themſelves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be conſtrained to the Plough; for in thoſe Countries, where the Ground was light, they did uſe often to Plough with Kine.

Pauſ. l. 1. Homer. Odiſſ. 11.

In the Forty Seventh year of Ehud, Tros began to Raign in Dardania, and gave it his own Name; about which time Phemone, the chief Prieſt of Apollo in Delphos, deviſed the Heroical Verſe.

Pauſ.

Of the ſame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia; whom Euſebius makes King of Phrygia; and alſo of that part of which the People were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was deviſed the Fable, that ſome Poets have applied to the paſſion of Love; and ſome to the Covetous that dare not enjoy his Riches. Euſebius calls this Tantalus the Son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta, Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, give him another Mother. He was ſaid to be the Son of Jupiter, as ſome will have it; becauſe he had that Planet in his Aſcendent, betokening Wiſdom and Riches. It is ſaid that when he made a Feaſt to the Gods, having nothing more precious, he cauſed his own Son to be ſlain and dreſt for the Banquet; of whom Ceres eat part of one of the Shoulders; whereby was ſignified, That thoſe men which ſeek after divine Knowledge, prefer nothing on Earth before it; no not the care of their own Children, of all elſe the moſt deareſt. And where it was deviſed, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his Lips, and yet ſuffered the Torment of Hunger and Thirſt, it was meant thereby, That though he abounded (by reaſon of his Riches) in all delicacy of the World, yet his mind being otherwiſe, and to higher deſires tranſported, he enjoyed no pleaſure at all by the reſt. Of whom Ovid:

Euſeb. præp. Evang. l. 2. Zezes hiſt. 10. Chil. 5.

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in Water ſeeks for Water and doth miſs,
The fleeting Fruit he catcheth at:
His long Tongue brought him this.

This puniſhment, they ſay, was inflicted upon him, for that he diſcovered the Secrets of the Gods: That is, becauſe he taught Wiſdom and Virtue to Mortal Men; which Story Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expreſt in Verſe. Others expound this Fable otherwiſe and ſay, That Tantalus, though he excelled in Riches, [illegible] being Thirſty of more abundance, was never ſatisfied. Of whom Horace againſt Covetouſneſs,

Tantalus à labiis ſitiens fugientia captat
Flumina, quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The Thirſting Tantalus doth catch at Streams that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the Name but chang'd, the Tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambroſia of the Gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that ſort puniſhed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Cœtanis convivis
Nectar Ambroſiámque dedit.

Becauſe that ſtealing Immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambroſia give
To gueſts of his own age to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, That the Secrets of Divinity, ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt Meats in a foul Stomack, are therein corrupted; ſo the moſt high and reſerved Myſteries are often perverted, by an unclean and defiled Mind.

To you it is given (ſaith Chriſt in Mark) to know the Myſtery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without all things be done in Parables. So is it ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul. Quid ſi Paulo licuiſſet effari ea, quorum ipſi cognitionem cœlum tertium & uſque ad illud progreſſio ſuppeditavit, fortaſſe de Deo nobis aliquid amplius conſtaret: If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither did bring unto him, peradventure we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Greg. in Orat. de recta ratione diſ. de Deo. 2. Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, ſaith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wiſe-man, Aſino lyram exponere, aut myſteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut ſus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabæus; quare ſilentium indixit diſcipulis, ne vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quam loquendo apprehendantur; To ſet an Aſs to a Harp, or to learn Myſteries, which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a Vial, or Scarabees and unclean Flie, ſoveraign Ointment. Wherefore he commanded ſilence to his Diſciples, ciples; that they ſhould not diſcloſe Divine Myſteries to the common ſort, which are eaſier learnt by Meditation than by Babling. And therefore did the Ægyptians Communicate their Myſteries among their Prieſts in certain Hieroglyphick Letters, to the end that their Secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar; and that they might beſtow the more time in the Contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the Contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tityus lived whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he ſought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the Earth, where ſhe was delivered of Tityus; whoſe Mother dying, and himſelf therein nouriſhed, he was therefore called the Son of the Earth. Pauſanias ſpeaking of the Grave of this Giant, affirms that his Body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lye of his ſtature out of Homer.

Hom. Od. 11. Porrectuſque novem Tityus per Jugera Terræ.
Aſſiduas atro viſcere paſcit Aves.

Nine Furlongs ſtretch'd lies Tityus, who for his wicked Deeds
The hungry Birds with his renewing Liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was ſtill eaten in Hell by Birds, and yet ſtill lived, and had his Fleſh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſaly lived alſo in this Age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerved as a Herdman, and afterward for his Excellent Wit was by him advanced; but having ſlain Hyacinthus he croſt the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia; where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his Bread by working in Brick, for building of the Walls of Troy, not by making the Bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp; according to him in Ovid which ſaith;

Ilion aſpicies, firmataque turribus altis
Mania Apollinea ſtructa Canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou ſhalt ſee with Walls and Towers high Built with the Harp of Wiſe
Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets; but others, that he laboured with his Hands, as hired in this work. And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens Witneſs, ſaith Pauſanias. Pauſ. in Att.

In theſe days alſo of Ehud, or (as ſome find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perſeus the Son of Jupiter and Danae, by whoſe Souldiers (as they ſailed out of Peloponneſus to ſeek their adventure on Africa ſide) Meduſa the Daughter and Succeſſor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as ſhe Hunted, near the Lake Triton, was ſurpriſed and Slain; whoſe Beauty when Perſeus beheld, he cauſed her Head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the Beauty whereof was ſuch, and ſo much admired, and the Beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as thereof grew the Fiction, that all that looked on Meduſa's Head, were turned into Stones. Triton a Lake of Africa, which Pliny calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg. Hiſt.

Cecrops the ſecond King of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acriſius the 13. or after Euſebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began alſo their Raigns, as it is ſaid, in the time of this Judge; of which the firſt Ruled 40. Years, and the ſecond 31. Years. Alſo Bellerophon lived in this Age, being the Son of Glaucus, the Son of Siſyphus; who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia the Wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her Husband that he offered to force her: Whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome Affairs of Weight, between him and his Son-in-law Jobates; giving ſecret Order to Jobates to diſpatch him: But Jobates thinking it diſhonourable to lay violent Hands on him; imployed him againſt Chymæra, a Monſter, vomiting or breathing Fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pitying his Innocency, ſent him the winged Horſe Pegaſus, ſprung up of the Blood of Meduſa, formerly ſlain by the Souldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to tranſport him; a Horſe that none other could Maſter or Bridle but Minerva: Upon which Beaſt Bellerophon overcame Chymæra, and performed the other Services given him in Charge; which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in Ambuſh to have ſlain him; but being Victorious alſo over all thoſe, he arrived to Jobates in ſafety; whom Jobates for his eminent Vertues honoured, firſt with one of his Daughters, and afterward with his Kingdom: After which he grew ſo inſolent, as he attempted to flye up to Heaven upon his Pegaſus; whoſe Pride Jupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging Flies ſo to vex Pegaſus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his Back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died Blind; of which Burthen Pegaſus being diſcharged (as the Fable goeth) flew back to Heaven; and being fed in Jupiter's own Stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This Tale is diverſly expounded, as firſt by ſome, That it pleaſeth God to relieve Men in their innocent, and undeſerved Adverſity, and to caſt down thoſe which are too high-minded: According to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon; that when he was expoſed to extream Hazard, or rather certain Death, he found both Deliverance and Honour; but waxing over-proud and Preſumptuous in his Glorious Fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of Sorrow, and ever-during Miſery. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chymæra, was meant a cruel Pyrate of the Lycians, whoſe Ship had in her Prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-Ship, and a Dragon in the Stern, of which three Beaſts this Monſter Chymæra was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kind of Galley of ſuch Swiftneſs, that it was called the flying Horſe; to whom the Invention of Sails (the Wings of a Ship) are alſo attributed. Many other Expoſitions are made of this Tale by other Authors; but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a Ship, for ſo Virgil calleth one of the greateſt Ships of Æneas. Euſeb. in Chron. Plutar. in claris Mulier. L. 5. Æneid.

Ion alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their Parent Javan) derive their Name of Iones, is ſaid to have been about Ehud's time: Homer calls them Iacnes, which hath a near reſemblance to the word of Javan. Perhaps it might be ſo that Ion himſelf took name from Javan; it being a Cuſtome obſervable in the Hiſtories of all times, to revive the Ancient name of a Fore father, in ſome of the principal of his Iſſue. Homer in Hymno ad Apoll. Lib. 18. c. 12. *de Civ. The invasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: But St. Augustine makes him far more ancient; placing him between the coming out of Ægypt, and the death of Joshua.

About the end of the 80. years, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodness, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods Commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the Parents of idle Security; so is Security as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both Danger and Subversion; of which all Estates in the World have tasted by enterchange of times. Therefore when their Sins were again ripe for Punishment, Jabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territory of Israel, and having in his Service 900. Iron Chariots, besides the rest of his Forces, he held them in subjection twenty years, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Propheteſs, who incouraged Barac to levy a Force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the Men of Nepthalim were more forward than the rest in this Action, it may seem to have proceeded, partly from the Authority that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common Grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the days of Jeptha, the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the War was, pressed most upon them, as being their Borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabite; and by the Counsel and Courage of a Woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the Valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenites Wife: So was it his Will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistless, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his Brutish Melancholy; and changed his matchless Pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angel; or as he did the Ægyptians in Moses's time: sometime by dead Bodys, as when he drowned Pharoah by the Waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by Hail-stones in the time of Joshua: Sometimes by the Ministery of Men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his Companions, by the Houshold Servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their own Confederates the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them to kill one another in the sight of Jehosaphat; and of the like, to these a Volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteſs speak unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine Honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which Victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the Fourth of Judges.

Jud. 4. 9.

After all which Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his Powerfulness, and great Mercies, she sheweth the weak estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations in these words: Was there a Shield or spear seen among Forty Thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not joyn themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead; that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the Children of Dan who Neighboured the Sea, crept into their Ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the Battle (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Jael the Wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent; shewing the Ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of Subjection, to hold correspondency with Jabin the Canaanite; yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their Love and Faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she deriderh the Mother of Sisera, who promised her Son the Victory in her own hopes; and fancied to her self, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praises and thanks to God only Victorious.

Jud. 5. v. 18.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression, to the end of that peace which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was Translated to Mycænæ: The Translation of this Kingdom Vives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the Son of Lynceus divided the Kingdom; of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos it self: Prætus his Brother possest Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea, there being many Monuments in Tirynthos, which witness Prætus possession, saith Pausanias.

Pau. in Corinthiacis.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the Son of his Daughter Danae; whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is fained that Jupiter turned himself into a Golden Shower, which falling into her lap, begat her with Child: The meaning whereof was, That some Kings Son, or other Worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with Gold; and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was Born; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his Grand-father the invention of the Discus, or leaden Ball, slew him unwillingly. After this Perseus, to avoid the infamy of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms with his Vncle Prætus; and Built Mycænæ. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a Brazen Vault, under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close Custody Horace hath this witty observation.

Incluſam Danaen, turris ahenea,
Robuſtæque fores, & vigilum Canum
Triſtes excubiæ, munierant ſatis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:
Si non Acriſium Virginis abditæ
Cuſtodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Riſiſſent, fore enim tutum iter & patens,
Converſo in pretium Deo.
Aurum per medios ire ſatellites,
Et perrumpere amat ſaxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The brazen Tower with Doors cloſe bar'd,
And watchful Bandogs frightful guard,
Kept ſafe the Maidenhead
Of Danae from ſecret love:
Till ſmiling Venus, and wiſe Jove
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a Golden Shower,
The God into her lap did power
Himſelf, and took his pleaſure.
Through guards and ſtony walls to break,
The Thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Then is a golden Treaſure.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who raigned in Phrygia; and Ilus who built Ilium; with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead; the Midianites aſſiſted by the Amalekites infeſted Iſrael. For when under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had injoyed any Quiet or Proſperity; the Judge was no ſooner Dead, than they turned to their impious Idolatry. Therefore now the Neighbouring Nations did ſo maſter them in a ſhort time (the Hand of God being withheld from their Defence) as to ſave themſelves, they crept into Caves of the Mountains, and other the like Places of hardeſt acceſs; their Enemies poſſeſſing all the Plains and fruitful Valleys; and in Harveſt time by themſelves, and the multitude of their Cattle deſtroying all that grew up, covering the Fields as thick as Graſshoppers; which ſervitude laſted Seven Years. Jud. 6.

Then the Lord by his Angel ſtirred up Gideon the Son of Joaſh, afterward called Jerubbaal; whoſe fear and unwillingneſs, and how it pleaſed God to hearten him in his Enterprize, it is both largely and preciſely ſet down in the holy Scriptures: As alſo how it pleaſed God by a few ſelect Perſons, namely 300. out of 32000. Men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hoſts: Each of theſe 300. by Gideon's Appointment carried a Trumpet, and Light in a Pitcher, Inſtruments of more Terrour than Force, with which he gave the great Army of their Enemies an Alarum; who hearing ſo loud a Noiſe, and ſeeing (at the crack of ſo many Pitchers broken) ſo many lights about them, eſteemed the Army of Iſrael to be infinite, and ſtrucken with a ſudden Fear, they all fled without a ſtroke ſtricken; and were ſlaughtered in great Numbers, two of their Princes being made Priſoners and ſlain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, becauſe he made War without their Aſſiſtance, being then greedy of Glory, the Victory being gotten; who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the Enterprize) would no doubt have held themſelves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeaſing them with a mild anſwer followed after the Enemy, in which purſuit being tired with Travel, and weary even with the ſlaughtering of his Enemies, he deſired relief from the Inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his Men being refreſhed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites, which had ſaved themſelves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations which had invaded and waſted Iſrael; to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already; and Zebah and Salmunna which fled. Jud. 6. v. 5. Jud. c. 6. & 7.

Gideon being denyed by them of Succoth, ſought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like ſort refuſed to ſuccour him. To both of theſe Places he threatned therefore the Revenge, which in his return from the Proſecution of the other two Princes he performed; to wit, that he would tear the Fleſh of thoſe of Succoth with Thorns and Briars, and deſtroy the Inhabitants and and City of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their Brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a Victory, if I may presume to make conjecture; it seems likely, first that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions to be made by the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zeba and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the Future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men, as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all Ages. For there are Multitudes of Men, especially of those which follow the Wars, that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praiseworthy Actions, for the Honour and Safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary Success. And such Malicious Hearts can rather be contented, that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard, and want, than that such Men as they mislike, should be the Authors or Actors of any Glory or Good to either.

Now Gideon, how or whersoever it were that he refreshed himself, and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former Victory to the utmost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt upon them) he again surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining; having put to the Sword in the former attempt 120000. and withal he took Zebah and Salmunna Prisoners; whom because themselves had executed Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands: His Son, whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this Marvellous Victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his Brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own Children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of Cruelty and Mercy are never left unsatisfied; for as he slew the Seventy Elders of Succoth with great and unusual Torments, so were his own Seventy Sons all, but one, Murthered by his own Bastard Abimelech. The like Analogy is observed by the Rabines, in the greatest of the Plagues which God brought upon the Ægyptians, who having caused the Male Children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own First-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a World of Examples might be given, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

A place in Basan as it is thought Jud. 8.10.

In the end so much did the People reverence Gideon in the present for this Victory, and their own Deliverance, as they offered him the Soveraignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not Reign over you, neither shall my Child Reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the People that they would bestow on him the Golden Ear-rings, which every man had gotten. For the Ismaelites neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites used to wear them: the weight of all which was a Thousand and Seven Hundred Shekels of Gold, which makes of ours, 2380. pounds, if we follow the account of the Shekle Vulgar. And because he converted that Gold into an Ephod, a Garment of Gold, Blew Silk, Purple, Scarlet, and fine Linnen belonging to the High-Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his House.

Jud. 8.23.

Exod. 28. Judg. 8. 28.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High-Priests which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark; and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of Linnen only.

Now if any Man demand, how it was possible for Gideon with 300. Men to destroy 120000. of their Enemies; and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Army came into the slaughter, and pursuit, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nepthali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: For this Army Gideon left in the Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his Enemies, who with the noise of his 300. Trumpets came after him to the Execution.

Jud. c. 7. v. 23.

There lived with Gideon Ægeus the Son of Pandion, who Reigned in Athens; Euristhens King of Mycenæ, Atreus and Thyestes the Sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristhens, the Kingdom of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus who holding his Brother in Jealousie, as an Attempter both of his Wife and Crown, slew the Children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest did therewith Feast their Father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his Son Agamemnon were slain by a base Son of Thyestes, yea the Grand-Children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same Sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus they say, having slain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos King of Crete for succour, where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth like unto that of Ægypt. Afward he was said to have framed an artificial Cow for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in Love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cow satisfie her lust, a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the People of Rome in his Amphitheater; of purpose as may seem to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable Show as a goodly Pageant in those vicious times.

Junctam Pasiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cæsar longeva vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a less unhonest construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her Counsel, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with Child, and that she being delivered of two Sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her Husband Minos, it was fained that she was delivered of the Monster Minotaur half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dædalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily; in which passage he made such Expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned Wings for himself, and his Son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with Boats, which had Oars only, Dædalus framed Sails both for his own Boat, and for his Sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new Invention, Icarus bearing himself over-bold was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with Legs, Arms and Hands; whereas those that preceded him, could only present the Body and Head of those Men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the Workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Varind. Plat. Pans. lib. 9. With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the Son of Apollo, and Terpsichore who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moon's Course, and of the Generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp.

Strab. l. 9 Again, in this Age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great Robber by Sea and Land, was by the Corinthian Army led by Oedipus overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of Riddles to those whom she mastered, was meant by the Rocky and unaccessible Mountain near Thebes which she defended, and by Oedipus dissolving her Problem, his Victory over her. She was painted with Wings, because exceeding Swift, and with the Body of a Lyon for her Cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the Wife of Cadmus; who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the Sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightful part, with her own Troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp War upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his Brother out of Crete, and held sharp War with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his Son Androgeus was slain by them. He possest himself of Megara by the Treason of Scylla, Daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every Year seven of their Sons; which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was slain at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus; and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Gyant, who was said to have 60. and odd Cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a Body found by Sertorius the Roman in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus; yet for my self I think it but a lowd lye. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning Wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth; and because he cast so many Men to the Ground, he was feigned to be the Son of the Earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece; but of Lybia; and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtil Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the Eleventh Year of Gideon, was that Famous Expedition of the Argonauts; of which many Fabulous Discourses have been written, the Summ of which is this.

Pelias the Son of Neptune, Brother by the Mother's side to Æson, who was Jason's Father, reigning in Iolcus a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one Shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one Shoe in passing over a Brook: Whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? To which question, when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the Golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that Service. Therefore Jason prepared for the Voyage, having a Ship built by Argus, the Son of Phryxus, by the Counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest Men of Greece to Sayl with him. As Typhis the Master of the Ship, Orpheus the Famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the Sons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, Sons of Æacus, and Fathers of Aiax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged Sons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great South-sayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great Wild-Boar; Ascalaphus and Jalmenus or Almenus the Sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last War of Troy, Laertes the Father of Ulysses, Atalanta a Warlike Virgin, Idas and Lynceus the Sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with Lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the Ship Argo; in whose Prow was a Table of the Beech of Dodona, which could Speak. They arrived first at Lemnos; the Women of which Island, having slain all the Males, purposing to lead an Amazonian Life, were nevertheless contented to take their Pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus, where dwelt a People called Doliones, over whom then raigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that loosing thence by Night, they were driven by contrary Winds back into his Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones, to be the same Men; but rather taken for some of their Bordering Enemies, by which means they fell to blows, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus; which when by day-light they perceived, with many Tears they solemnized his Funeral. Then departed they again and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the Son of Elates, who went to seek Hylas the Darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Mysia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos: From Mysia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia which then was peopled by the Bebryces the Ancient cient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the Son of Neptune was then King. He being a ſtrong man, compelled all Strangers to fight with him, at Whirl-batts, in which kind of fight he had ſlain many, and was now himſelf ſlain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew at Pollux, but his companions reſcued him, with great ſlaughter of the people. They ſailed from hence to Salmydeſſus, a Town in Thrace (ſomewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Sooth-ſayer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were ſaid to be a kind of Birds, which had the Faces of Women and foul long Claws, very filthy Creatures, which when the Table was furniſhed for Phineus came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the Victuals, did ſo defile the reſt, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craved his advice and direction for their Voyage: You ſhall do well (quoth he) firſt of all to deliver me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to ask my Counſel. Whereupon they cauſed the Table to be covered, and Meat ſet on; which was no ſooner ſet down, then that preſently in came the Harpyes, and played their accuſtomed pranks; when Zetes and Calais the winged Young Men ſaw this, they drew their Swords, and purſued them through the Air; ſome ſay that both the Harpyes and the Young Men died of wearineſs in the flight, and purſuit. But Apollonius ſaith, that the Harpyes did covenant with the Youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon diſmiſſed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, and adverti ed them withal of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of Winds running together, did ſhut up the paſſage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them into the paſſage; and if that paſſed ſafe, then to adventure after her, if not then by no means to hazard themſelves in vain. They did ſo, and perceiving that the Pigeon had only loſt a piece of her Tail, they obſerved the next opening of the Rocks and then rowing with all their might, paſſed through ſafe, only the end of the Poop was bruiſed.

From thence forward, (as the Tale goeth) the Symplegades have ſtood ſtill; for the Gods, ſay they, had decreed that after the paſſage of a Ship, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the Mouth of the River Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteouſly. Here Idmon a Sooth-ſayer of their Company was ſlain by a Wild Boar; alſo here Tiphys died, and Anſæus undertook to ſteer the Ship. So they paſſed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucaſus, and came to the River Phaſis, which runs through the Land of Colchos. When they were entred the Haven, Jaſon went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cauſe of his coming; deſiring him to deliver the Golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promiſed to do, if he alone would yoak together two Brazen hoofted Bulls, and Plowing the Ground with them, ſow Dragons Teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſow at Thebes. Theſe Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out Fire; Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whileſt Jaſon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa the Daughter of Æetes, fell into a moſt vehement Love of him, ſo far forth, that being excellent in Magick, ſhe came privily to him, promiſing her help, if he would aſſure her of his Marriage. To this Jaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by Oath. Then gave ſhe to him a Medicine, wherewith ſhe bad him to annoint both his Body and his Armor, which would preſerve him from their violence; further ſhe told him, that Armed Men would ariſe out from the Ground, from the Teeth which he ſhould ſow, and ſet upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, ſhe bad him throw Stones amongſt, them as ſoon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in ſuch wiſe that he might eaſily ſlay them. Jaſon followed her Counſel; whereto when the event had anſwered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was ſo far from approving ſuch his deſire, that he deviſed how to deſtroy the Argonautes, and burn their Ship; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jaſon, and brought him by Night to the Fleece, which hung upon an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where they ſay it was kept by a Dragon, that never ſlept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medæa caſt into a ſleep: ſo taking away the Golden Fleece, ſhe went with Jaſon into the Ship Argo: having with her, her Brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes underſtanding the practiſes of Medæa, provided to purſue the Ship; whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her Brother, and cutting him in pieces ſhe ſcattered his Limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding ſome, was fain to ſeek out the reſt, and ſuffer his Daughter to paſs: the parts of his Son he Buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word ſignifieth Diviſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his Subjects to ſeek the Ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not back Medæa, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus, which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great Tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abſyrtides, there the Ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) ſpake to them, and ſaid, That the anger of Jupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe, from the Murther of Abſyrtus. Now they thereupon Sailing between the Coaſts of Lybia, and Gallia, and paſſing through the Sea of Sardinia, and along the Coaſt of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they Sailed by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſung to allure them into danger; but Orpheus on the otherſide ſung ſo well that he ſtayed them. Only Butes ſwam out unto them, whom Venus raviſhed, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having paſt the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the ſtraging Rocks which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of Flames and Smoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them ſafe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coaſted Sicily where the beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Corcyra the Iland of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the Men of Colchos, that had been ſent by Æetes in queſt of the Ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his Will, betook themſelves to new habitations; ſome of them dwelt in the Mountains of Corcyra, others in the Ilands Abſyrtides, and ſome coming to the Phæaces, there found the Ship Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous, whereto Alcinous made Answer, That if she were not Jason's Wife they should have her, but if she were already Married, he would not take her from her Husband. Arete the Wife of Alcinous hearing this, Married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to return home, stayed with the Phæaces; so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Island Minos Raigned, who had a Man of Brass given to him (as some of the Fablers say) by Vulcan. This Man had one Vein in his Body reaching from the Neck to the Heel, the end whereof was closed up with a Brasen Nail, his Name was Talus, his Custom was to run thrice a day about the Island for the defence of it. When he saw the Ship Argo pass by, he threw Stones at it; but Medæa with her Magick destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by Potions, which made him Mad; others that promising to make him Immortal, she drew out the Nail that stopt his Vein, by which means all his Blood ran out, and he died; others there are that say he was slain by Pæan, who wounded him with an Arrow in the Heel. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for fresh Water. And lastly from Ægina they sailed by Eubæa and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arrived, having spent four whole Months in the Expedition.

Ship

Some there are that by this Journey of Jason, understand the Mystery of the Phylosophers Stone, called the Golden Fleece; to which also other superfine Chymists, draw the twelve Labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the Golden Fleece, was meant a Book of Parchment, which is of Sheeps-Skin, and therefore called Golden, because it was taught therein how other Mettals might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Jason Wisdom, and Moderation, which overcometh all Perils; but that which is most probable is the Opinion of Dercilus, That the story of such a passage was true, and that Jason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by Boat. For not far from Caucasus there are certain steep falling Torrents, which wash down many grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World, and the People there inhabiting use to set many Fleeces of Wool in those descents of Waters, in which the Grains of Gold remain, and the Water passeth through; which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many Rocks, Straits, Sands, and Currents, in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into those fiery Bulls, the Armed Men rising out of the Ground, the Dragon cast asleep, and the like. The Man of Brass, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poetical Morals; all which Homer afterward used (the Man of Brass excepted) in the Description of Ulysses his Travels on the same Inland-Seas.

Of Abimelech, Tholah, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and Theseus, Hyppolytus, &c.

After the Death of Gideon, Abimelech his base Son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his Father by the People, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his Fathers Religious Modesty) that some of his Brethren might take on them the Soveraignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem, (in which his Mother was Native) to make Election of himself, who being easily moved with the Glory, to have a King of their own, readily condescended; and the better to inable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of Silver of their Idol Baalberith, with which Treasure he hired a Company of loose and desperate Vagabonds, to assist his first detestable Enterprize, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. Brethren the Sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but Jotham the Youngest, who hid himself from his present Fury; all which he executed on one Stone, a Cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any Age. Such is Humane Ambition, a Monster that neither feareth God (though all powerful, and whose Revenges are without Date and for Everlasting) neither hath it respect to Nature, which laboureth the Preservation of every Being; but it rageth also against her, though garnished with Beauty which never dyeth, and with Love that hath no end. All other Passions and Affections by which the Souls of Men are tormented, are by their Contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But Ambition, which begetteth every Vice, and is it self the Child and Darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhumane soever) which may serve it; remembring nothing, whatsoever Justice, Piety, Right or Religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of the like attempts, to the errour or weakness of the Undertakers, and rather praiseth the Adventure than feareth the like success. It was the first Sin that the World had, and began in Angels, for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of Redemption. It was more Ancient than Man, and therefore no part of his natural Corruption. The Punishment also preceded his Creation, yet hath the Devil which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one, as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting every Age, and Mans Condition.

Jotham the youngest of Gideon's Sons having escaped the present Peril, sought by his best Perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse Tyrant, letting them know, That those which were Vertuous, and whom Reason and Religion had taught the safe and happy Estate of moderate Subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had not power to give, without Direction from the King of Kings; who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar People) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with

it's Fatneſs, the Fig tree with ſweetneſs, and the Vine with the good juice it had; the Bramble only, who was moſt baſe, cut down all the reſt, and accepted the Soveraignty. He alſo foretold them by a Prophetical Spirit, what ſhould befall them in the end, and how a Fire ſhould come out of the Bramble, and conſume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an eaſie matter to call thoſe men back, whom Rage without right led on) Gaal the Son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the ſervice of Abimelech; who therefore after ſome aſſaults entred the place, and maſtered it; and in concluſion fired the Town, wherein their Idol Baalberith was worſhipped, and put all the people of all ſorts to the ſlaughter. Laſtly, in the Aſſault of the Caſtle or Tower of Tebez, himſelf was wounded in the Head with a Stone thrown over the Wall by a Woman, and finding himſelf was Mortally bruiſed, he commanded his own Page to pierce his Body, thereby to avoid the diſhonour of being ſlain by ſo feeble a hand.

While Abimelech uſurped the Government, the Lapithæ and Centaurs made War againſt the Thebans. Theſe Nations were deſcended of Apollo, and were the firſt in thoſe parts that deviſed to manage Horſes, to Bridle and to ſit them: inſomuch as when they firſt came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the Plains, thoſe which had never ſeen Horſemen before, thought them Creatures compounded of Men and Horſes; ſo did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard firſt invaded that Empire.

Palæphetus l. 1. de incredib.

After the Death of Abimelech, Thola of Iſſachar Governed Iſrael 23. years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22. years, who ſeemeth to be deſcended of Iair the Son of Manaſſe, who in Moſes time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the ſame after his own Name, Haboth Iair. For to this Iair there remained Thirty of thoſe Cities, which his Anceſtor had recovered from the Amorites. Of theſe Judges, becauſe there is nothing elſe written, it is an Argument that during all their times, Iſrael lived without diſturbance and in Peace.

Judg. 10.

When Iair judged Iſrael, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at ſuch time as Hercules ſacked Ilium, was carried away Captive with his Siſter Heſione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for Ranſom, he Re-built and greatly ſtrengthened, and adorned Troy; and ſo far inlarged his Dominions, as he became the Supream Lord in effect of Aſia the Leſs. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Ciſſeus King of Thrace, and had in all (ſaith Cicero) fifty Sons, whereof Seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Heſione, took Helena the Wife of Menelaus, the cauſe of the War which followed.

In Tuſc.

Theſeus the Tenth King of Athens began likewiſe to reign in the beginning of Iair: ſome writers call him the Son of Neptune and Æthra; but Plutarch in the Story of his Life finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Græcian Sea between it and Aſia the Leſs took name. For when Minos had maſtered the Athenians, ſo far as he forc't them to pay him Seven of their Sons every year for Tribute, whom he incloſed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monſter Minotaur; becauſe belike the Sons of Taurus, which he begat on Paſiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: Among theſe Seven Theſeus thruſt himſelf, not doubting by his Valour to deliver the reſt, and to free his Country of that ſlavery, occaſioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his Son.

And having poſſeſt himſelf of Ariadne's affection, who was Minos's Daughter, he received from her a Bottom of Thred, by which he conducted himſelf through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Ægypt; by mean whereof having ſlain the Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his Father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with Victory and in ſafety, he ſhould uſe a White Sail in ſign thereof, and not that Mournful Black Sail, under which they left the Port of Athens. This inſtruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus deſcrying the Ship of Theſeus with a Black Sail, caſt himſelf over the Rocks into the Sea, afterwards called of his Name Ægeum.

One of the firſt famous Acts of Theſeus, was the Killing of Scyron, who kept a paſſage between Megara and the Peloponneſian Iſthmus, and threw all whom he maſtered into the Sea, from the High Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by Wreſtling, who uſed by that Art to kill others. He alſo rid the Country of Procruſtes, who uſed to bend down the ſtrong Limbs of Two Trees, and faſtened by Cords ſuch as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other Bough, and by their ſpringing back tare them aſunder. So did he root out Periphetes, and other miſchievous Thieves and Murtherers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazons, who after many Victories and Vaſtations, entred the Territory of Athens. Theſeus having taking their Queen Hyppolita Priſoner, begat on her Hyppolitus; with whom afterward his Mother-in-law Phædra, falling in Love, and he refuſing to abuſe his Fathers Bed, Phædra perſwaded Theſeus that his Son offered to force her; after which it is fained that Theſeus beſought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his Sons, by ſome violent Death. Neptune taking a time of advantage ſent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus paſſed by the Sea-ſhore, and ſo affrighted his Horſes, as caſting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miſerable and undeſerved Deſtiny, when Phædra had heard of, ſhe ſtrangled her ſelf. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Æſculapius to ſet Hyppolitus his pieces together, and to reſtore him to Life; which done, becauſe he was chaſt, ſhe led him into Italy, to accompany her in her Hunting, and Field-Sports.

It is probable that Hyppolitus, when his Father ſought his Life, thinking to eſcape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and received many Wounds in forcing his Paſſage, and which Wounds Æſculapius, to wit, ſome skillfull Phiſician, or Chirurgeon, healed again; after which he paſt into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is the Life of a Hunter, in which he moſt delighted. But of theſe ancient profane Stories, Plutarch ſaith well, That as Coſmographers in their Deſcriptions of the World, where they find many vaſt places, whereof they knew nothing, fill the ſame with ſtrange Beaſts, Birds, and Fiſhes, and with Mathematical Lines; ſo do the Græcian Hiſtorians and Poets, imbroider and intermix the Tales of Ancient times, with a World of Fictions and fabulous Diſcourſes. True it is, that Theſeus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his Pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggerly, mutable, and ungrateful Multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on Shells, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was Fifteen Years Old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux over-turned, when they followed after Theseus, to recover their Sister. Strab. lib. 9. Paus. in Con. Eratistratus and Pausanias write, that Theseus begat her with Child at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina; but her Age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The Rape Eusebius finds in the first of Iair, who governed Israel Twenty two Years, to whom succeeded Jeptha or Jephte Six Years, to whom Ibzan, who ruled Seven Years, and then Habdon Eight Years; in whose time was the fall of Troy. In Epist. Helen. Jud. 10.3. So as, if Theseus had a Child by her in the first of Iair, (at which time we must count her no less than Fifteen Years Old; for the Women did not commonly begin so young as they do now,) she was then at least two and Fifty Years old, at the Destruction of Troy; and when she was stolen by Paris eight and thirty; but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassens do in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successor of Mnestheus, the Successor of Theseus, Seventeen days before the Summer Tropick; and that about the Eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there; and in the next Spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath it otherwise, that when Polyphides governed Sicyon, Mnestheus Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Æneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty Ships the remainder of the Trojans; but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand. Bunt. Chron. Eus. Chron. Hal. lib. 1. Aug. de civ. dei l. 18. c. 19.

In Sicyona Phæstus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His Successors, Adrastus who reigned four Years, and Polyphides who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Iair; so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the Government of these two peaceable Judges, Mitreus, and after him Tautanes, reigned. In Ægypt Amenophis, the Son of Ramses, and afterwards Amenemes.

Of the War of Thebes which was in this Age.

IN this Age was the War of Thebes, the most Ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of. Wherefore the Romane Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this Objection.

——Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, semperque æterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alij quoque res cecinere poetæ.

If all this World had no Original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troy's last Fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder War.

It is true, that in these times Greece was very Salvage, the Inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes; and no Man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore Merchandize and other Intercourse they used little, neither did they Plant many Trees, or sow more Corn than was necessary for their Sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of Money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of Gold and Brass by the worth in Cattle; saying that the Golden Armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. Beeves, and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by Land and Sea were common and without shame, and to steal Horses or Kine was the usual Exercise of their great Men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the Principal City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable; briefly, Greece was then in her Infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have injoyed quietness within their narrow Bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them; yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will easily appear to such as consider, what Thucydides, the greatest of their Historians, hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these latter times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Frosts, or dry Summers, and other such things which no Man cares to read; so did they, who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion; or else rehearse Fables of Men changed into Birds, of strange Monsters, of Adultery committed by their Gods, and the mighty Men which they begat; without writing ought that savoured of Humanity, before the time of the War of Thebes; the brief whereof is this:

OEdipus the Son of Laius King of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an Infant, becauſe an Oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage contending for the way, ſlay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by Marriage of the Queen Jocaſta, called by Homer Epicaſte; on whom, not knowing her to be his Mother, he begat two Sons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his Parents, he underſtood the grievous Murther and Inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own Eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife and Mother did hang her ſelf. Some ſay, that OEdipus having his Eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his Sons, becauſe they ſuffered their Father to be caſt out of the Town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two Sons made this Agreement, that the one of them ſhould Reign one Year, and the other another Year; and ſo by courſe Rule interchangeably; but this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had after a Years Government reſigned the Kingdom to his Brother; or (according to others) when Eteocles had Reigned the firſt year, he refuſed to give over the Rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the Son of Talaus then Reigned, unto whoſe Palace coming by Night, he was driven to ſeek Lodging in an Out-Houſe, on the Back-ſide.

There he met with Tydeus the Son of OEneus, who was fled from Calydon; with whom ſtriving about their Lodging, he fell to blows. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe, came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the Shield of Tydeus a Boar, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembred an old Oracle, by which he was adviſed to give his two Daughters in Marriage to a Lion and a Boar; and accordingly he did beſtow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe levying an Army, and aſſembling as many Valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous among others to carry Amphiaraus, the Son of Oiclens, a great Sooth-ſayer, and a Valiant Man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to have foreſeen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adraſtus, did both utterly refuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore deale with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her Husband to aſſiſt him. The Sooth-ſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbad his Wife to take any Gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her Eyes ſo precious a Jewel, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Therefore whereas a great controverſie, between Amphiaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of Compromiſe put unto the deciſion of Eryphile, either of them being bound by Solemn Oath to ſtand to her appointment: She ordered the matter ſo, as a Woman ſhould, that loved a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was more eaſie to foreſee than avoid Deſtiny, ſought ſuch comfort as Revenge might afford; giving in charge to his Sons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their Mother, and make ſtrong War upon the Thebanes.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his Forces, of which, the Seven chief Leaders were, himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (inſtead of whom ſome name Meciſteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopæus the Arcadian, Son of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a Woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome Water, ſhe having a Child in her Arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring; but e're ſhe returned, a Serpent had ſlain the Child. This Woman was Hypſipyle the Daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom ſhe would have ſaved when the Women of the Iſle ſlew all the Males by Conſpiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian Life. For ſuch her piety, the Lemnian Wives did ſell her to Pyrats, and the Pyrats to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemæa, whoſe young Son Opheltes or Archemorus, ſhe did nurſe, and loſt as is ſhewed before. When upon the Childs Death ſhe hid her ſelf for fear of her Maſter, Amphiaraus told her Sons where they ſhould find her; and the Argives did both kill the Serpent, which had ſlain the Child, and in Memory of the chance, did inſtitute Solemn Funeral Games called Nemæan, wherein Adraſtus won the prize with his Swift Horſe Arion, Tydeus with Whorl-bats, Amphiaraus at Running and Quoiting, Polynices at Wreſtling, Parthenopæus at Shooting, and one Laodocus in Darting. This was the firſt Inſtitution of the Nemæan Games, which continued after Famous in Greece for very many ages. There are who think, that they were ordained in Honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedæmonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlain the Nemæan Lion: But the common Opinion agrees with that which is here ſet down.

From Nemæa the Argives marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly reſolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many Challenges, and obtained Victory in all of them, not without much Envy and Malice of the People, who laid Fifty Men in Ambuſh, to intercept him at his return to the Army, of which Fifty he ſlew all but One, whom he ſent back to the City as a Reporter and Witneſs of his Valour. When the Argives underſtood how reſolved Eteocles was, they preſented themſelves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to have had at that time Seven Gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far ſtronger, could ſcarce Muſter up more Thouſands than Thebes had Gates) did compaſs the Town. Adraſtus quartered before the Gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenus, Amphiaraus, at Proetis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electra, and Polynices at Hipſiſta. In the mean Seaſon, Eteocles having Armed his Men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took Advice of Tireſias the Sooth-ſayer, who promiſed Victory to the Thebans, if Menæcius the Son of Creon a Principal Man of the City, would vow himſelf to be ſlain in Honour of Mars the God of War. So full of Malice and Pride is the Devil, and ſo envious at his Creators Glory, that he not only challengeth Honours due to God alone, as Oblations and Sacrifices with all Divine Worſhip, but commandeth us to offer our ſelves, and our Children unto him, when he hath ſufficiently clouded Mens Underſtandings, and bewitched their Wills with Ignorance and blind Devotion. And ſuch abominable Sacrifice of Men, Maids, and Children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Ægyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through Ignorance or Fear they were moſt filled with Superſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he wax leſs impudent in Cunning, though not leſs malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous Inhumanity. For King Diphilus in Cypres without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country reſt contented with an Oxe inſtead of a Man. Tiberius forbad human Sacrifices in Africk; and crucified the Prieſts in the Groves where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown Men of Hay inſtead of the living, yet among the Salvages in the Weſt Indies theſe cruel Offerings have been practiſed of late Ages; which as it is a ſufficient Argument, that Satan's Malice is only covered and hidden by this ſubtilty among civil People: So may it ſerve as a probable Conjecture of the Barbariſms then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius as ſoon as he underſtood, that his Death might purchaſe Victory to his People, beſtowed himſelf (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himſelf before the Gates of the City. Then was a Battle fought, wherein the Argives prevailed ſo far at the firſt, that Capaneus advancing Ladders to the Walls, got up upon the Rampart; whence, when he fell or was caſt down, or (as Writers have it) was ſtricken down by Jupiter with a Thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were ſlain in this Battle, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in ſingle fight; whereto the two brethren according, ſlew each other.

Another Battle was fought after their Deaths, wherein the Sons of Aſtacus behaved themſelves very valiantly: Iſmarus one of the Sons ſlew Hyppomedon, which was one of the ſeven Princes; Parthenopæus being another of the ſeven (who was ſaid to have been ſo fair, that none would hurt him when his Face was bare) was ſlain by Amphidicus, or as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the Son of Neptune; and the Valiant Tydeus by Menalippus; yet ere Tydeus died, the Head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open and ſwallowed up the Brains. Upon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas who had brought from Jupiter ſuch remedy for his Wound, as ſhould have made him immortal, refuſed to beſtow it upon him; whereby perhaps was meant, that his Honour, which might have continued immortal, did periſh through the beaſtly Rage, that he ſhewed at his death.

The Hoſt of the Argives being wholly diſcomfitted, Adraſtus and Amphiaraus fled; of whom Amphiaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed quick into the Earth, near to the River Iſmenus, together with his Chariot, and ſo loſt out of Mens ſight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead Carcaſes or drowned in the River; and his Body never found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good Horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercy, he made Supplication for their Aid to recover their Bodies. For Creon having obtained the Government of Thebes, after the Death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the Bodies of the Argives to be buried; but cauſed Antigone, the only Daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, becauſe ſhe had ſought out and buried the Body of her Brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend forth an Army under the Conduct of Theſeus, which took Thebes, and reſtored the Bodies of the Argives to Sepulture; at which time Evadne the Wife of Capaneus, threw her ſelf into the Funeral Fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the Sons of thoſe Captains which were ſlain at Thebes, that any leſs revenge ſhould be taken of their Fathers Death, than the ruine of the City; wherefore ten years after having levied Forces, Aegialeus the Son of Adraſtus, Dyomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Eurypilus of Meciſteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon the Son of Amphiaraus; with whom alſo went his Brother Amphilochus. Apollo promiſed Victory if Alcmæon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were incountred by Laodamas the Son of Eteocles, then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the Battle, and ſlew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter the Citizens began to deſire Compoſition; but in the mean time they conveyed themſelves with their Wives and Children away from thence by Night, and ſo began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Eſtiæa. The Argives when they perceived that their Enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, ſacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the Town was ſaved by Therſander, the Son of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he ſaved the City from utter Deſtruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

Of Jephta, and how the Three hundred Years which he ſpeaketh of, Jud. 11. verſ. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with ſome other things touching Chronology about theſe times.

AFter the Death of Jair (near about whoſe times theſe things happened in Greece, and during whoſe Government, and that of Thola, Iſrael lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law, and Service of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped Baal and Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoining, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites; with thoſe of the Philiſtims. And as before it pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites; ſo now he ſcourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philiſtims.

Jud. 10.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſt, becauſe they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforc't to ſeek Jeptha, whom they had formerly deſpiſed and caſt from them, becauſe he was baſe Born; but he (notwithſtanding thoſe former injuries) participating more of Godly Compaſſion, than of deviliſh Hatred and Revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon Condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their Governour after Victory. And when he had diſputed with Ammon for the Land, diſproved Ammon's Right, and fortified the Title of Iſrael by many Arguments, the ſame prevailing nothing, he began the War; and being ſtrengthened by God, over-threw them; and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forc't them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Minnith, and Abel of the Vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the deſcription of the Holy-Land. After which Victory it is ſaid, that he performed the vain Vow, which he made, to Sacrifiſe the firſt living Creature he incountred, coming out of his Houſe to meet him; which happened to be his own Daughter, and only Child, who with all patience ſubmitted her ſelf, and only deſired two Months time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead; becauſe in her the Iſſues of her Father ended; but the other opinion that ſhe was not offered, is more probable, which Borræus and others prove ſufficiently.

The Perſecution of the Ammonites laſted 18. years and ended in the year of the World 2820. in which year Jephta began. Jud. 11.

Jud. 11. 33.

After theſe things the Children of Iſrael, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's Victory, otherwiſe making way to their future Calamity, and to the moſt grievous Slavery that ever Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had conteſted with Gideon. Jephta hereupon inforc't to defend himſelf againſt their Fury, in the incounter ſlew of them Two and Forty Thouſand, which ſo weakened the Body of the Land, as the Philiſtims had an eaſie Conqueſt of them all not long after: Jephta after he had Judged Iſrael Six years died; to whom ſucceeded Ibzan, who Ruled Seven years: After him Elon was their Judge Ten years: in all which time Iſrael had Peace. Euſebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Jud. 12.

Now before I go on with the reſt, it ſhall be neceſſary upon the occaſion of Jephta's Account of the times Jud. 11. 28. (where he ſays that Iſrael had then poſſeſt the Eaſt ſide of Jordan 300. years) to ſpeak ſomewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures, touching this point, ſeeming repugnant, or diſagreeing: The firſt is in this diſpute between Jephta and Ammon, for the right and poſſeſſion of Gilead: the ſecond is that of St. Paul Act. 13. the third that which is in the Firſt of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the poſſeſſion of Gilead for 300. years: Saint Paul giveth to the Judges, as it ſeems, from the end of Joſhua, to the laſt of Heli, 450. years. In the firſt of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Iſrael out of Ægypt, to the foundation of Solomons Temple, there were conſumed 480. years. To the firſt Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300. years to be but 266. years, to wit, 18. of Joſhua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephta (ſaith Beroaldus) putteth or propoſeth a certain number, for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi propè trecenteſimum, ex quo nullus item ea de re moverit Iſraeli; So he ſpeaketh (ſaith he) as meaning, that then it was about or well nigh the Three Hundreth year, ſince Iſrael poſſeſſed thoſe Countries, no man making queſtion of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were ſpent in Iſraels Captivity, at ſeveral times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole Sum, or any great part, leſt the Ammonite ſhould have juſtly objected, that 71. of thoſe years, the Iſraelites were in Captivity and Vaſſals to their Neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name Three Hundred years, it was enough for Preſcription, he omitted the reſt.

Jud. 11. 28.

1 King. 6. 1.

Id facit numero certo pro incerto propoſito.

To juſtifie this account of 365. years, beſides the 71. years of Captivity or Affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth alſo 28. years more, and ſo maketh up the Sum of 365. Theſe 28. years he findeth out thus; 20. years he gives to the Seniors between Joſhua and Othoniel; and where Beroaldus alloweth but 18. years to Joſhua his Government, Codoman accounts that his rule laſted 26. according to Joſephus; whereas St. Auguſtine and Euſebius give him 27. Melanchthon 32. The Truth, is that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of ſome part of the years of Affliction (to wit, 34. years of the 71.) if we add them to the 266. years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of theſe, we have the juſt number of 300. years. Neither is it ſtrange, that Jephta ſhould leave out more than half of theſe years of Affliction: ſeeing, as it is already ſaid, the Ammonites might except againſt theſe 71. years, and ſay that during theſe years, or at leaſt a good part of them, the Iſraelites had no quiet poſſeſſion of the Countries in queſtion. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making thoſe 300. years remembred by Jephta, to be 306. which odd years, ſaith he, Jephta omitteth. But becauſe the years of every Judge as they reigned, cannot make up this number of 306. but do only compound 266. therefore doth Luther add to this number, the whole time which Moſes ſpent in the Deſarts of Arabia Petræa; which Forty years of Moſes, added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I ſee nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's Judgment herein; for in the diſpute between Jephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words. Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Ægypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Ægypt; but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel took my Land; and therefore the beginning of this account, is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephtas answer also confirmeth in these words. When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Towns, and in Aroer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. years: Why did ye not then recover them in that space? So as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. years; and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes Intents or Purposes, but from their Victories and possessions.

Jud. 11. 28.

Junius nevertheless likes the Opinion of Luther, and says that this time of 300. Years had reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtas Narration; when he makes a brief Repetition of Moses's whole Journey; to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges in our Translation in these Words. But when Israel came up from Ægypt, &c. And therefore Moses his 40. years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. years; and not only the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text and Jephtas own Words; of which I leave the Judgement to others; to whom also I leave to Judge, whether we may not begin the 480. years, from the deliverance out of Ægypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Ægypt, and yet find a more probable Reconciliation of St. Pauls and Jephtas account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephtas's 300. years of Possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof; so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of Possession, which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephta might say, that they had possessed those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. years of their own Possession, and the rest of the Possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose Right the Israelites had by the Law of Conquest.

Junius in the 11. of Jud. note.

The second place disputed is this of St. Paul. Act. 13. that from the end of Joshua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the Letter, as I find his Opinion cited by Functius Krentzemius, and Beza, for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the Death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357. years; and this he doth the better to approve the times from the Egression out of Ægypt to the Building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. years.

Read the 24. of Josh. and 2. Jud. 7. Funct. Chron. fol. 4. Beza in his Annotations upon the 13. of the Acts v. 10.

Now for as much as St. Paul (as it seems) finds 450. years from the Death of Joshua, to the last of Heli, and leaves but 30. years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years ere the Foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was an errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of St. Paul; to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet; the Words then afterward, being clearly referred to the Death or after the Death of Joshua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where St. Luke rehearsing the Words of St. Paul wrote 350. years (saith Luther) the Scribe in the Transcription being deceived, by the affinity of those two Greek Words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois for Triacosiois 400. years, for 300. years, and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many Arguments; to which Opinion Beza in his great Annotations adhereth. A contrary Judgement to this hath Codeman; where Luther and Beza begin at Moses's Death, he takes his account from the Death of Joshua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. years; to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampson's years) 319. and of years of Servitude and Affliction under Strangers 111. The Reason why he doth not reckon Sampson's 20. years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampson's time they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. years of Servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. years, which two summs put together make 430. years, and whereas St. Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up St. Pauls number, to have been spent after the Death of Joshua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Chushan, or the Election of Othoniel; which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to St. Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24*th*. of Joshua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the Elders that over-lived Joshua, so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to St. Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this Opinion, if here also the 20. years of the Seniors, between Joshua and Othoniel, should be denyed. For they which deny these years, and make Othoniels 40. to begin presently upon the Death of Joshua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they have 20. years less than Codomon, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of Affliction, apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampson's years, and of the 40. years of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they have 20. years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. years of Oppression, all of them apart from Sampson's 20. but Codoman as is said makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the 30. of the Philistims Oppressions; so that if the 20. years of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the Letter of the Text seems to inforce) that the Philistims in an Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. years, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Judge, and so the reckoning will come to 450. years between the end of Joshua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of any Inter regnum of the Seniors, between Joshua and Othoniel: For if the times of their Affliction be summed, they make 111. years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just summ of 450. And this Computation, either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their

Act. 13. 20.

Jud. 13. Jud. 25. 11.

Cor-

Correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the Death of Moses; certainly the place of St. Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true, that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be St. Paul's Words; And about the time of 40. years, God suffered their Manners in the Wilderness; And he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by Lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the Eighteenth Verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the Nineteenth Verse he cometh to the Acts of Joshua; which were that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by Lot. In the Twentieth Verse it followeth; Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450. years, &c. And therefore to reckon from the Death of Moses, is wide of St. Paul's meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in the Opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that, it seems irreconcileable with the account 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. years between the end of Joshua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be more than 480. years between the beginning of the Israelites journying from Ægypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480. years 1. Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their Journying from Ægypt, which he makes to be 25. years after the beginning of Othoniels Government; from whence if we cast the years of the Judges, with the years of Servitude (which Sums according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. years) and so to these years add the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the Third of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480. years. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the Annus egressionis, 1 Reg. 6. 1. should be understood egressionis non incipientis sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Ægypt, (for so it is in the Original) or the year after they came out of Ægypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For so we find that things which were done 40. years after they had set foot out of Ægypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Ægypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Ægypt, Jordan was driven back, and Deut. 4, 45. These are the Testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Ægypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the word ab exitu, to be as much as quùm exiviſſent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius Deut. 4. 45. do well read quùm exiviſſent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture expound ab exitu to be, poſtquàm exiviſſent.

Jos. 14. 1.

The next point to be cleared is, how their journying should be said, not to have had end until the 25. year after the Victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time; at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Jud. 18. For doubtless to this time the expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephta and St. Paul, with that in the first of Kings c. 6. Now whereas it is said, that the expedition of the Danites was, when there was no King in Israel: To this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary, that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40. years of rest, of which Jud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. years after his Victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Soveraignty; and so either way it might truly be said, that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othoniels Victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as Consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it self round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good; especially considering that the speeches of St. Paul, have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of Authority, we may justly suspect the Supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such, as the Consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the Conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the Five and Twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own Conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the Office of a Judge after Five and Twenty years, that it might then be truly said, there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own Eyes?

Jud. 18. 1.

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Ægypt; like as we say, that King Edward the first was Crowned, when he came out of the Holy Land; for so all Journies with their accidents commonly take name from the place, either whence or whither they tend. But I think he can find no such phrase of Speech in Scripture, as limiteth a journey by an Accident, or saith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Ægypt. Indeed most unproper it were to give date unto Actions commenced long after, from an Expedition finished long before; namely to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palæstina, did win Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may we then believe, that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the Conquest at the journeys end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Ægypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of Time, serving as the only guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning, from that illustrious Deliverance out of Ægypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and month are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the Year and Month wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by 600. Men, that robbed a Chappel by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods name? For this accident, whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle St. Paul did not here in Labour bour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his People, delivered them out of Bondage, and ruled them by Judges, and Prophets, unto the time of Saul; did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose Succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much, which tended as a Preface to the Declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact Calculation of Times (the History being so well known, and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. years consumed in the Wilderness, whereof no man doubted; saying, that God suffered their manners in the Wilderness about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the days of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an 100 and 11. years of Bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact Computation to be included within the 339. years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent Digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is a work not so needful as laborious, to search out of this place, that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the Sum of 480. years is so expresly and purposely set down,

Now that the Words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copy through errour of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronology, but must be taken as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the Vulgar; it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. years to the reign of Saul; whereas it is manifest, that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea that far the greater part of them were spent under the Government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that with so much Cunning forsake the general Opinion, when it favoureth not such Exposition, as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their Diligence, than follow their Example. The Words of St. Paul were sufficiently justifyed by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common Opinion among the Scribes in those days, that the 111. years of Servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. years ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the Vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; as it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it to be so indeed; and therefore dis-joins the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himself against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast up the years from the departure out of Ægypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very month it self.

Now (as commonly the first Apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own Interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new Exposition for that, which is of it self most plain, than to examine his own Conjecture upon a place that is full of Controversie. Thus by expounding, after a strange method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he looseth himself in those ways, wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new Opinions, he must needs answer, That Othoniel could not govern above 25. years, because then was the taking of Laish, at which time there was no King in Israel: That the Danites must needs have taken Laish at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards, from the Foundation of the Temple, to any Action that might be termed the Coming of Israel out of Ægypt, without excluding the years of Servitude; And that the years of Servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure St. Paul with an Exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the Decision of any judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephta are referred the Death of Hercules, the Rape of Helen by Paris, and the Provisions which her Husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his Brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this Rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan; from which time, if the War of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Alon or Elon, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves; the rule holding not true in this War, longa præparatio Belli celerem affert Victoriam; That a long Preparation begets a speedy Victory; for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy as it seems was entred, sackt and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the sixth year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule died, after he had heen the Father of 40. Sons and 30. Grand-Children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of Israel's Oppression by the Philistims (of which Jud. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon; I see no great reason for that Opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Jephta, for not calling them to War over Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own Territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed Men into the Field, it is not likely that they were then oppress; and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims, with so powerful an Army, for their own deliverance, than against their own Brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other Enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward; or else they must be referred to the interregnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogy of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they have observed Historical Truth.

THE War at Troy, with other Stories hereupon depending, (because the ruine of this City, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather chose here to intreat of in one intire Narration, beginning with the lineal Descent of their Princes, than to break the Story into pieces, by rehearsing a-part in divers years the diversity of Occurrents.

The History of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their Original, and of their Continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdom. This is the Opinion of Virgil; which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable; if Annius borrowed it from him, then it rests upon the Authority of Virgil, who saith thus.

Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.
Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima Regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si rite audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum est advectus ad oras:
Optavitque locum Regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergameæ steterant; habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater Cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra,
Idæumque nemus.

In the main Sea the Isle of Creet doth lie:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is mount Ida; there in fruitful Lrnd
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our Grand-sires came To the Rhætean shores; and raigned there
Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy; their dwelling-place they sought
In lowest Vales. Hence Cybel's rights were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remove:
And hence the name of our Idæan Grove.

Thus it seems by Virgil, who followed surely good Authority, that Teucer first gave name to that Country, wherein he raigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus; of which Dardanus in the same Book he speaks thus.

Est locus Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens Armis atque ubere glebæ.
Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sed, hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jasiusque Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Græcians call the place;
An ancient fruitful Land, a War like Race.
Oenotrians held it, now the latter progeny
Gives it their Captain's name, and calls it Italy.
This seat belongs to us, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stock, Iasius.

Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Æneid. l. 7.
Auruncos ita ferre senes, his ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes,
Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhenâ ab sede profectum
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Auruncans, I remember well
(Though time have made the Fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy;
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leaving Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In Golden Palace of the starry skie.

But contrary to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the Son of Japhet; and that the Dardanians, Mysians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were German Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the Son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Ascanius in Asia took Name. That Ashkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely; neither is it unlikely that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe; that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassens makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose Authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the Truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow; seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus and others, that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not Founder of the City; and his Daughter or Niece Batia, was the second Wife of Dardanus, Founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks, that Atlas raigned in Samothracia, and gave his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus; and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the Son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and Wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Jasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he gives the addition of Coritus, as a Title of Dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the Faction between these Brethren, which grew to such heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the History gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter, than the Father of those that lived about the War of Troy. So is it likewise probable, that Atlas the Father of Electra, was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of the Gods; but it was the Custom to ascribe to some one the Acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self, with making any narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others give him none, and carrying the Line of Dardanus in manner following.

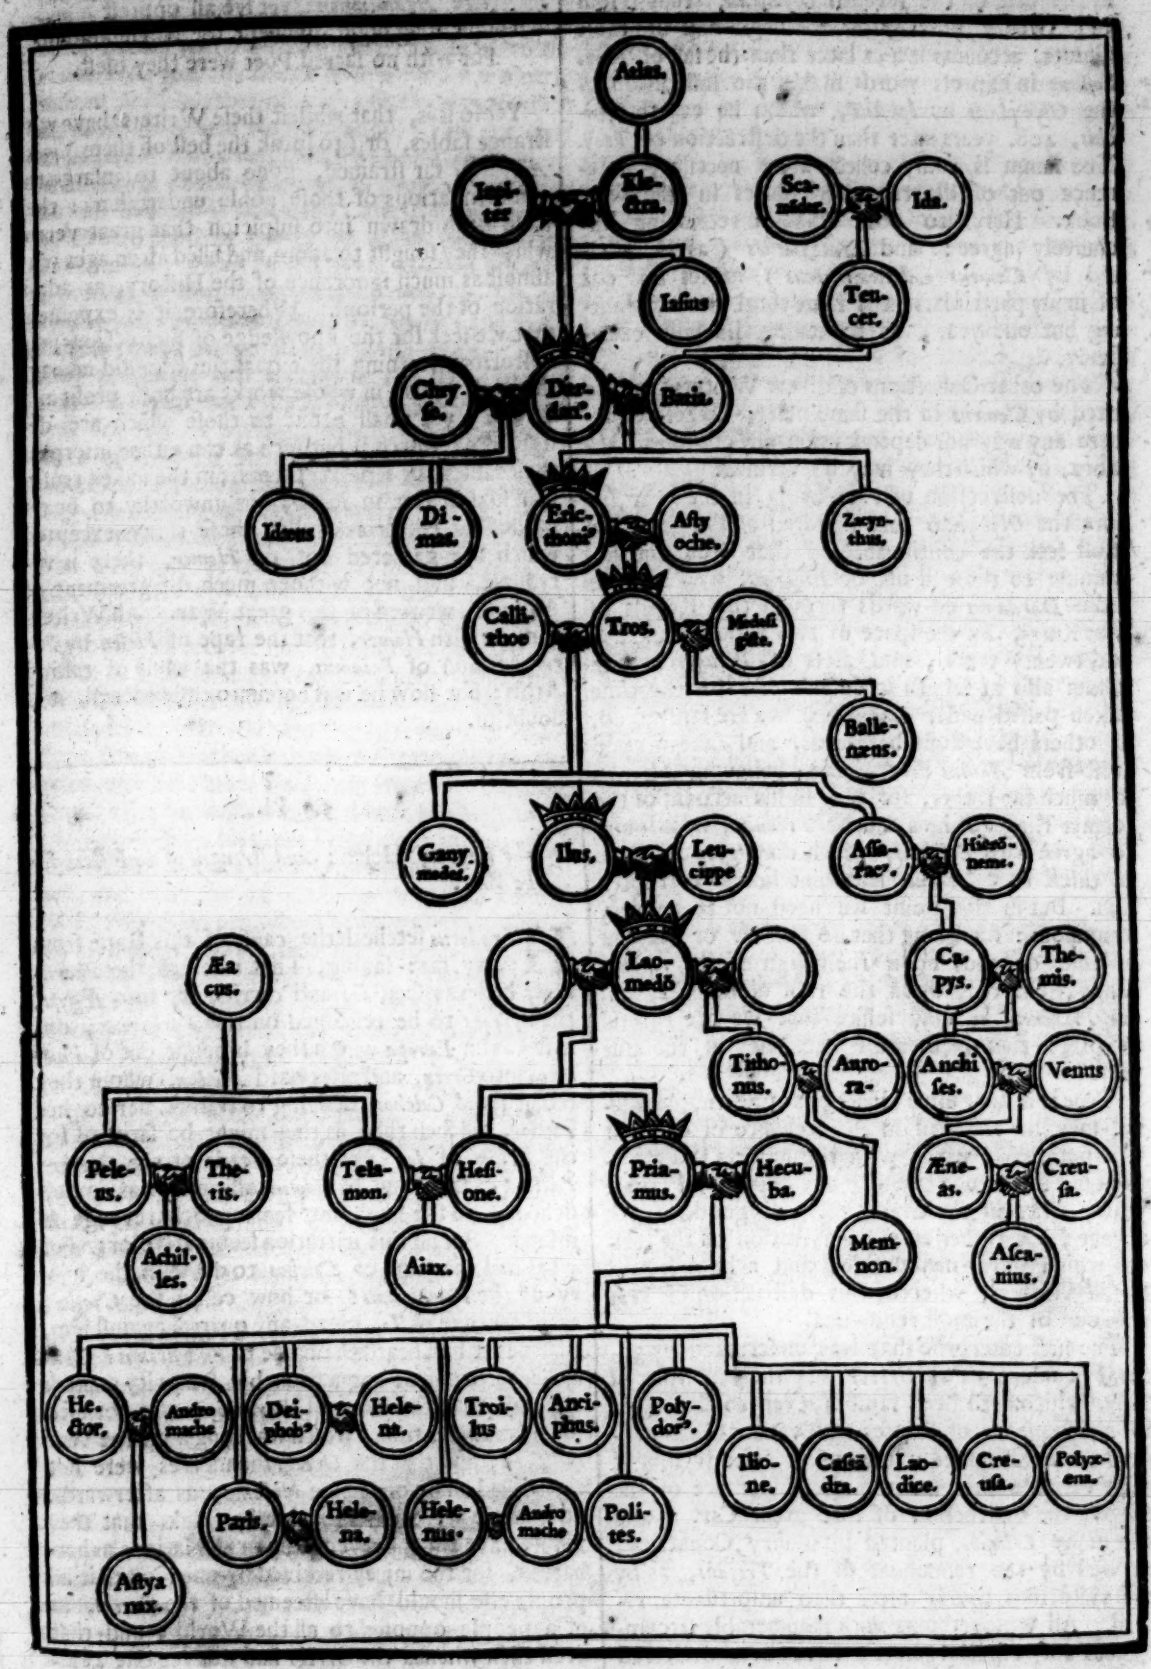
Boccace de gen. Deor. l. 4. c. 31.

Atlas



Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan Kingdom, with the length of every Kings Reign, I have choſen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Hiſtory, whereon depends the moſt antient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the conſent of Writers, and general paſſage of things elſewhere done. And firſt for the deſtruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilſt it ſtood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. years more ancient than the beginning of the 94*th* Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did paſs between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the firſt year of the 94*th*. it is manifeſt that the remainder of 780. that is 408. years went between the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt inſtitution of thoſe games of Iphitus, if the authority of Diodorus be good proof, who elſewhere tells us, that the return of the Heraclida, which was eighty Years after the fall of Troy, was three hundred twenty eight years before the firſt Olympiad.

Diod. l. 4.

Diod. in Præf.

Dionys. Halic. Antiq. l. 2.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnasseus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is four and twenty years after the beginning of those Games, accounts it 432 later than the fall of Troy.

Solin. Polihist. c. 2.

Solinus in expres's words makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 408. years later than the destruction of Troy. The summ is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same Book. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same total summ, wanting but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

Eusib. de prep: Evang. l. 10 c. 3. Clt. Alex. strom. lib. 1.

The other Collections of divers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any way nor depend upon any collateral History, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred and eight, we must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Eusebius, who leads us from Dardanus on-wards through the Reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are fain to do, as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings Reigns and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no History or account of time depends upon the Reign of the former Kings, but only upon the ruin of the City under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is that some objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different Computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece was the last War of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great Battels fought with variable success: the long indurance of the Siege; the destruction of that great City; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especial note, have been delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many Writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose Verses have given immortality to the Action, which might else perhaps have been buried in Oblivion, among other worthy Deeds done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

Vixêre fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illachrimabiles
Urgentur, ignotique longâ
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon: yet lye all oppress
Under long night, unwept for and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these Writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to inlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted overmuch; but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great War. All Writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the Son of Priamus, was the cause of taking Arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this Rape from very far: saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Ægypt, the Greeks to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her Father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the Rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was imboldened to do the like; not fearing such revenge as insued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phœnicians? or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides a writer of unquestionable Sincerity maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the War of Troy; and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World; and that even then whenas the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the Rape of Helen was to procure the re-delivery of Hesione, King Priamus his Sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true. For Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel Man, seeing his own Son Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the War of Troy, but fled into Cypres, only because his Brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her Brother would seek to take her from from her Husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born Children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the Rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione: but was meerly incited by Venus, that is by his lust, to do that which in those days was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and having stollen them, either to sell them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pirythous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides were so common, that none durst inhabit near unto the Sea, for fear of pyracy, which was accounted a trade of Life no less lawful than Merchandise: wherefore Tyndarus the Father of Helen, considering the beauty of his Daughter, and the Rape which Theseus had made, caused all her Wooers who were most of the principal Men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn Oath, that if she were taken from her Husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a Husband to his Daughter, who chose Menelaus Brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helens Rape, was partly the Oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndarus. Here unto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he imbarked for Troy in his own Ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that Expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by Oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two Brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus, or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise, take Arms against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sail or thereabouts: but the Vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build Ships with Decks; only they used (as Thucydides saith) small Ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty Men, the greatest 120, every Man (except the Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian Army consisted of 100000 Men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this Army, doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homer's Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans; the Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greeks unwilling to come to the tryal of Arms, if things might be compounded by Treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Aegyptian Priests makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The summ of his Discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the Coast of Aegypt, was accused for the Rape of Helen by some Bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Aegypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the Goods taken with her, till her Husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a Stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Aegypt: they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the War, which ended with the ruin of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his Wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Aegypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driven thither by contrary winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul weather. For Paris immediately upon the Rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas; whereas Menelaus might have put into any Port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Aegyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many miseries befal him, during the War, and so many of his Sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was Heir to the Kingdom (for Hector was elder) nor equal in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the War of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was Sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have been Twinns) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the Father of Ajax in their company before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal Commander in the Trojan War. But whether it were so, that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon's Daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is that the malice of the Devil which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible till some fatall impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise; under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Ajax and Teucer the Sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his Sons Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Ulysses; Mnesthens the Son of Petreus, Captain of the Athenians: Diomedes the Son of Tydeus, a Man of singular Courage; the wise and learned Palamedes; Ascalaphus, and Ialmenus, the Sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the Son of Paan, who had the Arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas said that the City could not be taken; Ajax the Son of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tisandrus, Eurypilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the Son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the Sons of Æsculapius: Epeus who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the Town was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Grecians at the Siege.

THese and many other of less note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily perswade them to think that the War would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of Men, they won ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallness of their Vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Chersonesse: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the War protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the Town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the Field against such Greeks, as continued the Siege, and a more safe retreat, if the Enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, that from the first year till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible the report of Herodotus; That the Greeks did not lie before Troy the first nine years: but only did beat up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and inriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did block up the Town, unto which they returned not until the fatal time drew near, when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the Field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting upon an high Tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the Town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by Land and Sea: the other that the whole Army did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these Authors: for they make report of many Towns and Islands wasted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the Army could not well, nor would have spared if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great Pestilence arose amongst the Greeks: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests Daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go, for any Ransome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sun: who raised pestilent Foggs, by which the Army was infected, being lodged in a Mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well be that the Camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their Ships within the Fortifications.

Hom. Iliad. 3.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive Woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the Chieftains in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnon's Woman should be restored to her Father, Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say that he alone would not lose his part of the spoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Companies. But the Greeks incouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homer) or for love of himself and his Sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks, when they wasted the Countries adjoyning unto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the Town, he was little inferiour to his Enemies in numbers of Men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other Sons of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his Sons, Polydamus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the Sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival, Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the the Greeks were many Battles fought: the greatest of which were, that at the Tomb of King Ilus upon the Plain; and another at the very Trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the Fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their Ships; at which time Ajax, the Son of Telamon with his Brother Teucer, were in a manner the only Men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another Battel (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on Armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his Body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the Armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a Man, to strip him and hale away his Body, not restoring it without Ransome, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon Horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three Horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their Horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with Swords and Battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their Armes defensive were Helmets, Breast-plates, Boots of Brass or other Metal, and Shields commonly of Leather, plated over. The offensive were Swords and Battel-axes at hand; and Stones, Arrows or Darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the Leaders were much subject, because of their Armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heaviest: also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the Field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of Armours they had little change or none; every Man (speaking of the chief) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his Armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear Friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his Concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next Battel Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chaced three times about the Walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the City (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have forborn to open some of their Gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the Noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the custom then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him shamefully about the Field, selling the dead Body to his Father Priamus for a very great ransom. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenged; for he was shortly after slain with an Arrow by Paris, as Homer says, in the Scæan Gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the Daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren, and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after some proof given of her valour, was slain by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dictys, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

FInally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treason of Æneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the Gates of Troy called Scæa, was the Image of a Horse, and that the Greeks entring by that Gate, gave occasion to the report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horse. It may well be that with some wooden Engin, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the Walls, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ramm: or scaled the Walls upon the sudden, and so took the City. As for the hiding of Men in the hollow body of a wooden Horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were incloſed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon) or they might have left it a few days without the City (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Walls upon the sudden to do it) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this Horse was built so high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the Gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall, to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the incloſing of so many principal Men was altogether needless, considering that without without their help there was way sufficient for the Army, so that the surprising of any Gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discoursing of this War, saith that the Greeks did both batter the Wall with a wooden Engin, and were also let into the City by Antenor, at the Scean Gate: the Townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the Fleet of the Grecians had hoisted Sail, and was gon the day before to the Isle of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares and Dictys must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two Authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that War made against the Common report: had it not been that either those Books were even in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no such repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of Men slain in this War which Dares and Dictys say to have been above 600000 on the Trojan side, and more than 800000 of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; forasmuch as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and Deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200 Sail, and the Army therein transported over the Greek Seas, not much above 100000 Men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of Men to extol the Deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks, that served in the War; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Menestheus the Son of Peteus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yield unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200 good fighting Ships, and 30000 Men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adjoyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the Son of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth that the Posterity of Hector did resemble such of the Trojans as were left, and Reigned over them about Troy.

Of the distress and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

COncerning the Greeks, they tasted as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes that by reason of their long abode at the Siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction; some were slain anon after their arrival; others were debarred from the Sovereignty among their people, by such as had staied at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Army which weakned much by the calamities of that long War, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many pieces under several Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the Booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his Brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some Sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailing to the Isle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in hast.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife and by the adulterer Ægysthus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Ægypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor Estate, with much ado recovering the Mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the Son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Dauni, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally it appears in Homer that the Grecian Ladies, whose Husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Samson after a vacancy or Interregnum for certain years succeeded.

CHAP.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of SAMSON.

2970. THE Birth and Acts of Samson are written at large in the 13, 14, 15, and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Story. First that the Angel of God forbad the Wife of Manoah the Mother of Samson, to drink Wine or strong Drink, or to eat any unclean meat, after she was conceived with Child, because those strong Liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the Child in the Mothers Womb. Though this were even the counsel of God himself, and delivered by his Angel, yet it seemeth that many Women of this Age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept; the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of Wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the World, and the Races of the able and strong Men in effect decayed.

Secondly, its to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that profess divination by the help of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his Wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful Tears: by the first he lost but a part of his Goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit; Whom no force could overmaster, Voluptuousness overturneth.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30 of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel fear the Philistims, as they assembled 3000 Men out of Juda, to besiege Samson in the Rock or Mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over us? &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow and slew 1000 with the Jaw-bone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made Blind, and a Prisoner by the Treason of his Wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his Enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the House at the Feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem, Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and loss, as by derision and contumely.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Ark taken, and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

THE Story of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his House, for the wickedness of his Sons, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, 1 Sam. 2. 22. both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the Women by the Sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the Swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first incounter 4000 and in the second battel 30000 Footmen; among whom the Sons of Eli being slain, their Father (hearing the lamentable success) by falling from his Chair, brake his Neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stock of Ithamar the Son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the Race of Eleazar the eldest Brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the Son of Eleazar the third, Abisue the Son of Phinees the fourth, his Son Bocci the fifth, Ozi the Son of Bocci the sixth, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their Successors. The Ark of God which Israel brought into the Field, was in this battel taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c. 1 King 2. 27. and 1 Chron. 6. Psal. 78.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Ark whereby himself was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the Sacrament, or representation which was the Ark, than in God himself, they would have observed his Laws, and served him only: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no Ark at all, 1 Sam. 5. vers. 6. nor in the times of the Maccabees: and yet for their piety it pleased God to make that family as victorious, as any that guarded themselves by the sign in stead of the substance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the Field as an Ensign; David witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would have carried the Ark with him; he for- 2 Sam. 15.

had it, and caused it to be returned into the City, using these words. If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as seemeth good in his Eyes.

The Trojans believed that while their Palladium or the Image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the City should never be overturned: so did the Christians in the last fatal Battel against Saladine carry into the Field, as they were made believe, the very Cross whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the Battel, their Bodies and the Wood. But Chrysostom upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint John's Gospel about their necks, for an amulet or preservative. Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If those words do not profit Men in their Ears (to wit, the hearing of the Gospel preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Cross, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memory of his Covenant: and the Faith in his Son, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest Victory and Glory which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and set it up in the house of Dagon their Idol: but that night the Idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and set it again in his place. And it fell the second time, and the Head brake from the Body, and the Hands from the Arms, shewing that it had nor power nor understanding in the presence of God; for the Head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the Hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the Arms. For God and the Devil inhabit not in one House, nor in one Heart. And if this Idol could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marveled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh, and sent him into the World, that all the Oracles wherein the the Devil derided and betrayed mortal Men lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had never beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins Body, shining upon the Earth which had been long obscured by Idolatry, all those foul and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that Age concerning the death of the great God Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his Brains for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old Devil did then dy as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rable became speechless.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this Victory, God strook them with the grievous Disease of the Hemorrhoids of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by general consent ordered that the Ark should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. For the hand of the Lord was against the City with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the City both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third City of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slain thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the City. In the end, by the advice of their Priests, the Prince of the Philistims did not only resolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Ægyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their Inheritance, and from his Service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be Almighty, and that their own Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sin-Offering, using these words; So ye shall give glory to the God of Israel that he may take his hand from you, and from your Gods and from your Land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an Enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharaoh confess the living God, when he was plagued in Ægypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

1 Sam. 4. vers. 9.

c. 6. vers. 5.

This counsel therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hæmorrhoids, and the Golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make trial whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the Territory of Israel: then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their Calves, but that they would have followed them wheresoever; much less when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the World if Calves be removed from their Dams, the Kine will follow them through Woods, and Desarts by the Foot, till they find them. But the Kine travailed directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Joshua of the same City, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look into the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandments and had been taught accordingly: He strook them more grievously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kiriath-jearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twenty year in the charge of Eleazar his Son, untill David brought it to Jerusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Mispah and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Ark: or at least, it was for the † present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-jearim.

Of Samuel and of his Government.

THese Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a Child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was descended of the Family of † Chore or Korach. For Levi had three Sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the Family of Chore, Samuel. His Father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephratæan, not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of * Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's Father was called an Ephratæan, because born at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his Mother being long fruitless, obtained him of God by Prayers and Tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish Women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his Seed should multiply, as the Stars of Heaven, and the sands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomy the seventh; There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

† 1 Chron. 6. 22.

* Which region was called Ephrata, as appeareth Jud. 12. 5. whence for distinction we read Ruth 1. 2. Ephratæi è Bethlehem Judæ, the Town Ephrata which is Bethleem in Juda Gen. 35. 19. from the Region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Ps. 132. v. 6. Ephrata is put for Silo, which was in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his Mother according to her former vow dedicated him to God, and his service, to which she delivered him even from the Dugg. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five Sheckles, between five years and twenty for twenty Sheckles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, and yet did Moses account himself such a one, as in the 18. of Deuter. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Before time in Israel, when a Man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his Grace from Israel: but as the Chaldæan Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Maspha or Mitspa, seated on a Hill in Benjamin near Juda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

Vers. 15. 1 Sam. 9.

1 Sam. 13. See in this Book, c. 12. §. 1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for War at Mispa in the beginning of Samuel's Government, gathered their Army and marched towards the City: at whose approach the Israelites struck with fear, and with the memory of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) It pleased him with Thunder and Tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophecy of Hanna, Samuel's Mother. The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall be thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an Earth-quake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their Victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memory of this happy success obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the Victory, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The Estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elsewhere said.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as he was sacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismaied, answered, Ego autem sacrificio. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAUL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the Government into a Kingdom.

BUT when age now began to over-take Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of so careful a Government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his Sons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beersheba, a City, the very utmost towards the South of Judæa. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no less removed from the justice and vertue of their Father. For the thirst of Covetousness the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain; to recover which they set the Law at a price, and sold justice and judgment to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural Man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errours of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of Government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might alſo lead them to the War and defend them againſt their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable ſucceſs which followed the rule of Eli his Sons, when thoſe of Samuel by their firſt Bloſſoms promiſed to yield fruit no leſs bitter, they ſaw no way to put the Government from out his race, whom they ſo much reverenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cauſe of ſo great conſequence and alteration, Samuel ſought counſel from God: which ſurely he did not for the eſtabliſhing of his own Sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this ſpeech or motion diſpleaſing him, he uſed his beſt arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miſeries which ſhould befall them. And yet, all which he fore-ſhewed was not intolerable, but ſuch as hath been born, and is ſo ſtill by free conſent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For firſt he makes them know that the King will uſe their Sons in his own ſervice to make them his Horſe-men, Charioteers, and Foot men; which is not only not grievous, but by the vaſſals of all Kings according to their birth and condition deſired: it being very agreeable to Subjects of the beſt quality to command for the King in his Wars; and to till the ground no leſs proper and appertaining to thoſe that are thereto bred and brought up: ſo are likewiſe the offices of Women-ſervants to dreſs meat, to bake Bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: He will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your beſt Olive Trees, and give them to his Servants; with other oppreſſions; this hath given, and gives daily occaſion to ſuch as would be ruled by their own diſcretion, to affirm that Samuel deſcribeth here unto them the power of a King, governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination conſtrue this Text far otherwiſe, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Soveraign's hand. The former opinion is grounded firſt upon that place of Deuteronomy, where God fore-ſheweth this change of Government from Judges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many Wives, Covetouſneſs, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to raign over Iſrael, ſhould write the Law of Deuteronomy, or cauſe it to be written: and to ſhew how greatly the King ſhould honour the Law, he addeth, It ſhall be with him, and he ſhall read therein all days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and theſe ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his days in his Kingdom, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, ſay they, is contrary to the Laws of God: in the ſame book written. For it is ſaid, That which is juſt and right ſhalt thou follow, that thou mayſt live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canſt eat out of another mans Vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leſs lawful to take the Vineyard it ſelf from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (ſay they) ſuch as do warrant the Kings of Iſrael, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vaſſals. For it is not ſaid that it ſhall be lawful for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sons: and again, this ſhall be the manner of the King that ſhall raign over you. God thereby fore ſhewing what power ſevered from piety, (becauſe it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hereof we find the firſt example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the truſt which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commmanded, That his people ſhould be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore though the King had offered unto Naboth compoſition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in Money which he refuſed: yet becauſe he was falſly accuſed and unjuſtly condemned (though by colour of Law) how grievouſly Achab was puniſhed by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea ſufficient for Achab againſt the all-righteous God, to ſay that it was done without his conſent, and by the Elders of Iſrael. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David teſtifieth of himſelf. Poſuiſti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Auguſtine is very true. Simulata innocentia non eſt innocentia: ſimulata æquitas non eſt æquitas: ſed duplicatur peccatum in quo eſt iniquitas & ſimulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled in which there is both iniquity and diſſimulation. Such in effect is their diſputation who think this place to contain the deſcription of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary ſide, as they are many and forcible, ſo are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely diſcourſe of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatiſe I may not preſume to abridge, much leſs here to inſert. Only thus much I will ſay, that if practice do ſhew the greatneſs of authority, even the beſt Kings of Juda and Iſrael were not ſo tied by any Laws, but that they did whatſoever they pleaſed in the greateſt things; and commanded ſome of their own Princes, and of their own brethren to be ſlain without any trial of Law, being ſometime by Prophets reprehended, ſometime not. For though David confeſſed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the ſame was not imputed unto him as any offence.

That the State of Iſrael ſhould receive this change of Government, it was not only foretold by Moſes in Deuteronomy, but propheſied of by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter ſhall not depart from Juda, &c. It was alſo promiſed by God to Abraham for a Bleſſing. For it was not only aſſured that his iſſues ſhould in number equal the Stars in Heaven, but that Kings ſhould proceed of him. Which ſtate ſeeing it is framed from the Pattern of his ſole rule, who is Lord of the Univerſal: and the excellency thereof in reſpect of all other Governments, hath been by many judicious Men handled and proved, I ſhall not need to over-paint that which is garniſhed with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every Man hath obſerved what civil War Iſrael had: what outragious ſlaughters they committed upon each other: in what miſerable ſervitude they lived for many years: and when it fared beſt with them, they did but defend their own Territories, or recover ſome parts thereof formerly loſt. The Canaanites dwelt in the beſt vallies of the Country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan: the Philiſtims the Sea-Coaſts: and the Jebuſites Hieruſalem it ſelf, till David's time: all which that King did not only conquer and eſtabliſh, but he maſtered and ſubjected all the Neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vaſſals. But whether whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the Sons of Samuel, they became deaf to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point that they would have a King, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every Man to his own City and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present unto him a Man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandred divers days to seek his Fathers Asses, at length by the advice of his servant travailed towards Ramath, to find out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his Beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Ass, and not a Kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight Sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of Beasts, and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So John and Jacob were taken from casting their nets, to become Fishers of Men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours do: but permanent and everlasting in Gods endless Kingdom.

1 Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much less knowing the Honour which attended him: asked Samuel in whar part of the City the Seer dwelt, Samuel answered that himself was the Man he sought, and prayed Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the Kingdom, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two Men should encounter him by Rachel's Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his Beasts, to doubt the loss of his Son: that he should then meet three other Men in the plain of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit and Prophecy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, Men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Eliseas, Isay, Jeremy, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praterita, presentia & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh 1 Cor. 1. 14. who inriched with Spiritual gifts expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

Chrys. in psal. 43.

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the general opinion is, that he was cholen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of * Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mystery upon his breast when he asked counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all Nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. † Cicero, Plautus, ‖ Pausanias, and others have remembred divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the division of Grounds or honours; and in things to be under-taken: the two first kinds were called divisory; the third divinatory; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howsoever they may seem chanceful, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him Presents as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, took no notice.

* The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the High Priest were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum, they were placed in the pectoral over against the heart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the pretious Stones nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. c. 28.

§. III.

Of the eſtabliſhing of Saul by his firſt victories.

NO ſooner was Saul placed in the Kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to beſiege Jabes Gilead: which Nation ſince the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durſt attempt any thing upon the Iſraelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover thoſe Territories which firſt the Amorite, and then Iſrael diſpoſſeſt them of: which they made the ground of their invaſion in Jephta's time; yet they never perſwaded themſelves of more advantage than at this preſent. For firſt they knew that there were many of the Iſraelites that did not willingly ſubmit themſelves to this new King: ſecondly, they were remembred that the Philiſtims had not long before ſlain 34000. of their Men of War: and beſides had uſed great care and policy that they ſhould have no Smiths to make them Swords or Spears: neither was it long before that of the Bethſhemeſites and places adjoyning, there periſhed by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in theſe reſpects, even occaſion it ſelf invited them to inlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neareſt. Beſides it may further be conjectured that the Ammonites were imboldened againſt Jabes Gilead, in reſpect of their weakneſs, ſince the Iſraelites deſtroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them againſt the Benjamites: at which time they did not only ſlaughter the Men and Male-children, but took from them their young Women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increaſed to any great numbers: And if they had recovered themſelves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonite might flatter himſelf with the opinion, that Iſrael having for long time been diſarmed by the Philiſtims, was not apt to ſuccour thoſe whom they had ſo deeply wounded and deſtroyed. But contrariwiſe when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ranſome themſelves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they ſhould be utterly diſabled for the War, as elſewhere hath been ſpoken: Saul, both to value himſelf in his firſt years raign, and becauſe perchance he was deſcended of one of thoſe 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to aſſemble the forces of Iſrael: hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and ſending them by meſſengers over all the Coaſts, proteſting thus. That whoſoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, ſo ſhould his Oxen be ſerved: threatning the people by their Goods, and not by their lives at the firſt. Seven days had Saul to aſſemble an Army, by reaſon that the Gileadites had obtained the reſpite of theſe ſeven days to give Nahas the Ammonite an anſwer: who, could they have obtained any reaſonable condition, were contented to have ſevered themſelves from Iſrael, and to become Vaſſals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul aſſembled the forces, which repaired unto him at Bezec, near Jordan, that he might readily paſs the River; which done he might in one day with a ſpeedy march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

Jud. 21.

1 Sam. 11. 8. The Army by Saul led conſiſting of three hundreth and thirty thouſand: he returned an anſwer to thoſe of Jabes, that they ſhould aſſure themſelves of ſuccour by the next day at noon. For as it ſeemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he ſurprized the Army of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might ſet on them on all ſides, he divided his force in three parts, putting them to the Sword, until the heat of the day, and the wearineſs of Saul's troups, inforc'd them to give over the purſuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careleſs and ſecure, in that thoſe of Jabes promiſed the next morning to render themſelves and their City to their mercy. After this happy ſucceſs the people were ſo far in love with their new King, that they would have ſlain all thoſe Iſraelites that murmured againſt his election, had not himſelf forbidden and reſiſted their reſolutions. Such is the condition of worldly Men, as they are violent lovers of the proſperous, and baſe vaſſals of the time that flouriſheth: and as deſpightful and cruel without cauſe againſt thoſe, whom any miſadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

After the Army removed, Samuel ſummoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as ſome Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel uſed an exhortation to all the aſſembly, containing precepts, and a rehearſal of his own Juſtice during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one year before he was eſtabliſhed in Gilgal or Galgala, he ſtrengthened himſelf with a good guard of 3000. choſen Men, of which he aſſigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his Son at Gibeah, the City of his nativity: the reſt he kept about his own perſon in Micmas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IV.

Of Saul's diſobedience in his proceedings in the Wars with the Philiſtims and Amalekites, which cauſed his final rejection.

Jonathan with his ſmall Army or Regiment, that attended him, taking a time of advantage, ſurprized a Garriſon of Philiſtims: the ſame, as ſome think, which Saul paſt by, when he came from Rama where he was firſt annointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: becauſe a place where the Philiſtims had a Garriſon 1 Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they underſtand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius underſtands this Garriſon to have been at Gebah, in Benjamin near Gibha where Jonathan abode with his thouſand followers. Howſoever by this it appeareth that the Philiſtims h.ld ſome ſtrong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Iſrael: and now being greatly inraged by this ſurprize they aſſembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horſe, wherewith they invaded Judæa, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a City of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hieruſalem, and in the midſt of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this ſuddain invaſion the Iſraelites were ſtrucken in ſo great a fear, as ſome of them hid themſelves in the caves of the Mountains, other fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelf with ſome 2000. men of ordinary, and many other people, ſtaid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the paſſage of Joſhua when he led Iſrael over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuel's appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel ſeven days: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained tained not unto him, and to offer a burnt-offering and a peace-offering unto God, contrary to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of the Hebrews, and God's Commandments: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and ſo make the ſin of Saul not to have been any intruſion into the Prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to Gods Commandment, in not ſtaying according to the appointment 1 Sam. 10. 8. ſecondly a diffidence or miſtruſt in Gods help, and too great relying upon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him he could not bear patiently; and laſtly a Contempt of the Holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of ſo godly a Man might procure him. But whatſoever was his ſin, notwithſtanding his excuſes, he was by Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in terms unfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel ſo to do, from God himſelf, at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdom ſhould be conferred to another (a Man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his Poſterity.

Verſ. 14.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his Army found it to conſiſt of 600. Men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea and among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either Sword or Spear, but Saul and his Son Jonathan only. For the Philiſtims had not left them any Smith in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides they that came to Saul came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the year before, or in ſome part of this very year, to ſuccour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thouſand Men, if there had not now been any Iron weapon to defend themſelves withal, ſave only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his Son. But howſoever, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims and all thoſe craftſmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Iſraelites only files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuff as ſerved for the plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kind of arms it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not have attempted upon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any Sword in all Iſrael, but only that there was not any found amongſt thoſe 600. Souldiers which ſtayed with Saul after Samuel's departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had publickly reprehended Saul, that his own guards forſook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinary Souldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

1 Sam. 13. 7.

1 Sam. 13. 22.

With this ſmall troop he held himſelf, to his own City of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength and better aſſured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſs that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarm the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoever in the time of Samuel much had been done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by Sword or Spear, but by Thunder from Heaven: and when theſe craftſmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no marvail if they could not in a ſhort peace under Samuel, be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philiſtims is to be underſtood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not ſuffering their artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any ſtore of armour. The ſame policy did Nabuchodonoſor uſe after his Conqueſt in Judea: Dionyſius in Sicily; and many other Princes elſewhere in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons in part the Iſraelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philiſtims had not invaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquity uſed, and their preſent neceſſity miniſtred unto them; to wit, Clubs, Bows, and ſlings. For the Benjamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the natural weapons, and the firſt of all Nations, it is manifeſt; and ſo in the firſt of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour David againſt Saul; while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bows, and could uſe the right and the left hand with ſtones; and with a ſling it was, that David himſelf ſlew the Giant Goliah.

While the State of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard terms, the Philiſtims having parted their army into three troops, that they might ſpoil and deſtroy many parts at once; Jonathan ſtrengthened by God, and followed with his Eſquire only, ſcaled a Mountain, whereon a company of Philiſtims were lodged: the reſt of their Army (as may be gathered by the ſucceſs) being incamped in the Plain adjoyning. And though he were diſcovered before he came to the Hill top, and in a kind of deriſion called up by his enemies: yet he ſo behaved himſelf, as with the aſſiſtance of God he ſlew twenty of the firſt Philiſtims that he incountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, fear, and jealouſie, they ſlaughtered one another in ſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrews which became of their party, becauſe they feared to be ſpoiled by them, took the advantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly Saul himſelf taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelves in mount Ephraim, ſet upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that Prophecy in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them ten thouſand.

1 Sam. 14. 12.

1 Sam. 14.

This done, the ſmall army of Iſrael made retreat from the purſuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his Son Jonathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptineſs, taſted a drop of Hony in his paſſage: for which Saul his Father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan ſeems to have reduced unto the Philiſtims remembrance their former overthrow likewiſe miraculous in the days of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies; namely the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he prevailed. He then aſſembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. Men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart, belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Ægypt; in which War he took Agag their King priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compaſſion, becauſe they firſt of all other attempted Iſrael, when they left Ægypt in Moſes's time: he notwithſtanding did not only ſpare the life of Agag, but reſerved the beſt of the beaſts and ſpoil of the Country, with pretence to offer them in ſacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know, that God would caſt him from from his Royal Estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the Offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there been no former Precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to injoyn the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from under Heaven. For the cruelty which the Predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were overwearied, sick, faint and aged People, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation above 400. Years afterward; and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his Forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himself having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy Sword hath made other Women Childless, so shall thy Mother be Childless among other Women; at which time Samuel himself (after he had been by many bootless intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the Occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the Sons of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might avoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom he sought to avoid the inconvenience or dangers of this Life, then do those Men mistake the nature of his divine Ordinance, who neglecting the Reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as Men stupified in the opinion of Fate, or Destiny, neglecting either to beg counsel at God's hand, by Prayer, or to exercise that Wisdom or Fore-sight, wherewith God had inriched the mind of Man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made, and could destroy the World in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul by the accustomed cautious ways of the World.

Of the Sons of Ishai, Samuel by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliab, the first-born; who though he were a Man of a comely Person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six Brethren, made choice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his Flock, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the Life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in Battel by the Philistims.

1 Sam. 16.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his Power through many Victories by him obtained, while they had sitten still and forborn to give impediment to his prosperous Courses, thought it good to make new trial of their Fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured Neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient Enemies. Now for the quality of their Souldiers, and all Warlike Provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equal, if not superiours to Israel. The success of their former Wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Army possessed with a needless fear had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their Forces and taken the Field, encamping so near to the Army which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a Battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in gross, but maintaining some Skirmishes, as refusing both of them to pass the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single Combat, as willing to try in one Man's Person, whether any stroak from Heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertook to defie the whole Host of Israel, provoking them with despightful words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering Condition, that the Party vanquished in Champion, should hold it self as overcome in gross, and become Vassal to the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by God's appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publick notice of the People. For no Man durst expose himself to encounter the great strength of Goliah, until David (sent by his Father of an Errand to the Camp) accepted the Combat, and obtained the Victory, without other Arms offensive or defensive than a Sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Giant, and after with his own Sword strook off his Head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as Subjects to the Conquerour, according to the Covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own Gates. By this Victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their People discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this Victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the Honour purchased by his well deserving. For after such time as the Spirit of God departed from Saul and came upon David, he then became a cruel Tyrant, faithless and irreligious. Because the High-Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessity with hallowed Bread, and armed him with the Sword of his own Conquest taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech, and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the City, and smote with the edge of the Sword both Man and Woman, both Child and Suckling, both Ox and Ass, and Sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his People, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrary to the Commandment and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store, for the innocent, for the Lord's servants the Priests of Israel.

Israel. Yea he would have slain his own Son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocency, as also once before for tasting the Hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his Father's unreasonable Commination. The Companions of 1 Sam. 24. 23. Cruelty are breach of Faith towards Men, and impiety towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his Daughter, whom he had promised him: and again in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as David had twice spared his Life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought Counsel of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought Counsel from God he had been always Victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this success followed, that both himself, and his three Sons, with his neerest and faithfullest Servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his Body with the Bodies of his Sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the Walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found Burial in the Bowels of ravenous Birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Jabes stoln their Carcases thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40. Years, and by himself after Samuel 20. Years, according to Act. 13. 31. Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. Chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same Chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant Man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those Victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their Adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the Power and Pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their Issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second Year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David born; after Codoman later, and in the ninth Year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, saith he, was thirty Years old when he began to Reign: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the forty Years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel, Æneas Silvius the Son of Posthumus began his Reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State 31. Years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as Brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus sate in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire 40. Years. In this Age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof 328. Years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Helles, and the people Hellens, of Hellen, the Son of Deucalion, Lord of the Country of Phthiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no Name common to all the Inhabitants, neither were the People called Hellens, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great Victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Country under their Obedience, calling themselves generally by one Name, and yet every several Nation after some one of the Posterity of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And because this is the furthest Antiquity of Greece, it will not be amiss to recount the Pedigree of her first Planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the Son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the Names of his Parents, had in the Greek Tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomy and Philosophy.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all Men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his Wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessaly, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalion's time was that great Flood, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose Sons were Xuthus, Dorus and Æolus, of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundry parts of Thessaly, did afterward seat themselves about Parnassus: and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest Son of Hellen, being banished by his Brethren, for having diverted from them to his own use some part of their Fathers Goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, he begat on her two Sons, Achæus and Ion. Of these two Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave Name to that Region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Army recovered the Kingdom of his Grand-father in Thessaly.

Ion being General for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great Victory, and thereby such Love and Honour of the People, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some Occupation, or good course of Life. When the People multiplied he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Country Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives Name in Ægialia, where he and his Posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old Name) gave to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephews of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Achæans possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to seek a new Seat, came unto the Iones, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alledging in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been Brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expel the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the Son of Orestes, in that War.

Thus

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western Coast thereof, on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universal or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the War of Troy, and 60. years after the descent of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdom about 700. years. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the Son of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these twelve great labours.

First, he slew the Nemæan Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine Heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the over-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted Mount Erymanthus in Arcady: The fifth was the cleansing of Augeas his Ox-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Geryons Beeves from Gades, the Golden Apples of the Hesperides, and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit as both over-long to be here set down, and no less perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travels to be the twelve signs of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables: That he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Towns, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him. Also that he slew many Thieves, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poetical vanity. His travels through most parts of the World are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Lybicus. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his indeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no City of Greece (Athens excepted,) requited the vertue and Deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was Son of Sthenelus, and Grandchild of Perseus; he raigned in Mycena, the mightiest City then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madness he had committed upon his own Children, but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousie by Eurystheus, because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein he was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece, and had by many Wives and Concubines above threescore Children. These Children Eurystheus would fain have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx King of Trachinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers Son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heraclida. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slain in battel, he died again. It seems to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his Cosins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slain, they took Atreus the Son of Pelops to their King; for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the people. Against him the Heraclida marched under Hyllus the Son of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echemus King of the Tegeata a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclida should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heraclida compelled to forbear their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority shews, though some have said, that they came under the conduct of his Children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that Country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the World, that happened about this age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as * Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamæon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to † Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversity of opinions, both of the time and of the native City of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind Men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verb ὁμηρεῖν: for this Homer in his latter time was blind. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also † Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. years before before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the Worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which Authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guess of the difficulty, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diversity of opinions a Man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: and * Eratosthenes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the Army of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the War of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporary with Gyges, who began to Reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which he seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his Son Nicander; Philocorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agesilaus governed Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 100. years after the Ionian Plantations, came to visit him, near 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes's enterprise against the Gracians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan War. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joas King of Juda 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronology he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelical preparation where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek Writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus: Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion and others.

* As both Cle. Alex. and Tatian. Assyr. report his opinions, verum Phil. 43. Ros. in disc. temporum. Phil. in comm. in Archilog.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the Elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned Fablers was first born: but he finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirms himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and left by Hesion in Helicon.

Varro de imag. lib. 1.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvii Reigned in Alba, about * 140. years after the fall of Troy. † Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the Son of Pelias, King of Thessaly. For my self, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiosity of this Mans age is no less ridiculous, than the Inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mystery. In derision whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his Book with that word? who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to do.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius Sennemires, ruled Ægypt at this time: for Tanephersobris was his successour who preceded Vaphres, Father-in-Law to Salomon.

About the end of Saul's government, or in the beginning of David's time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the World, not only by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up, somewhat nearly together, six Kingdoms into greatness not before erected. In Italy, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the King of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered their form of Government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became Master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subjected the Judæans, corrupted their Religion, and held them under in a most abject, and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumæans, Moabites, Ammonites, Madeanites, Ituræans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebusites, Geshurites, Machathites, all which acknowledged David for their Soveraign Lord, and paid him tribute.

Of DAVID.

Of David's estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazzards which David ran into while he was yet only designed King, and living as a private Man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both Armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the Son of Saul, that he loved him as his own Soul: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his Son, that David would assuredly be the ruin of his House, and Estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Jonathan could never be perswaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signal act of David's, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his houshold Servant, and his Esquire, or Armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp; whereby it was thought that he might find ease, which came to pass accordingly. He entertained David, for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the Men of War. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed weary of his good affections, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved only through envy of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a Spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease.

Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzy, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third Book of Anger witnesseth. But the madness of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that musick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Cens. c. 12. & 14.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the Commandment of 1000. Soldiers, to confront the Philistims withal. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promised him his Daughter Merab to Wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger Daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistims would take David's head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now David's victories begat new fears and jealousies in Saul, he practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murther him in his own House, but Michol his Wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimilech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himself, he was forc'd to counterfeit both simplicity and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims he covered himself in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him into Moab, he hid himself in the deserts of Ziph, Maon, and the Hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his Master Saul was known to prosecute him.

Jansen. in Psal.

Of Achis David obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way and strook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawn blood of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siklag. At his return he found the Town burnt, his two Wives with the Wives and Children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellows mutinied, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

* It seemeth that Simeon never obtained Siglag till this time, for it is said in the 1 of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertaineth unto the King of Judah unto this day.

This Army of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three Sons were slain. The news with Saul's Crown and Bracelets were brought to David, at Siklag, in his return from being victorious over Amalech, by a Man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsly) that himself at Saul's request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withal. Otherwise it followeth not that every Man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the Law; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro exclorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit Religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unless some other proof inform the Conscience of the Judge. For a Man may confess those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glos reconcile these two places in this sort. Si quis in judicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any Man in judgment do confess of himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtir up ſorrow and move compaſſion in the heart of David.

The Victory which the Philiſtims had gotten was ſo great, that ſome Towns of the Iſraelites, even beyond the River of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the Enemy, who took poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire. Moſt like it ſeems, that the Civil War immediately breaking out between David and the houſe of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the reſt of Iſrael, gave them hope of an eaſie Victory over both; and thereby cauſed them to attempt nothing at the preſent, leſt by ſo doing they ſhould inforce their diſagreeing enemies to a neceſſary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part ſhould conſume the other, by which means, both the Victors, and the Vanquiſhed, would become a prey to the violence of ſuch as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of David's Reign, and the War made by Abner for Iſhboſheth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, ſought to advance Iſhboſheth (or Jeboſtus according to Joſephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Iſrael: for Mephiboſheth the firſt Son of Jonathan lived. Againſt this Abner, and Iſhboſheth, David made a defenſive War, till Abner paſt Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he ſent Joab with ſuch forces as he had, to reſiſt Abner: Iſhboſheth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The Armies encountred each other near Gibeon, where it ſeemeth, that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that Combat between the Lacedemonians, and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being choſen of each Nation, of which number three perſons were only left unſlain. The like trial by a far leſs number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romans and Latines. The ſame challenge Goliah the Philiſtim made, whom David ſlewe a cuſtom very ancient. Edward the Third offered the like trial in his own perſon to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperor. There were twelve choſen of each part, in this War of David with the Houſe of Saul, to wit, ſo many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whoſe force and valour was ſo equal, as there ſurvived not any one to challenge the Victory. But the quarrel ſtaid not here: for the Army of Juda preſt Abner in groſs, and brake him. Three hundred and ſixty Men of Abner's Companions were ſlain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Aſahel the Brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs purſue Abner, and by Abner's perſwaſions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounding him to death, with the ſtroke of his Spear. For though Aſahel were an excellent Footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Joſephus reporteth, contended not only with Men, but with Horſes; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have maſtered Abner (who as Aſahel perſwaded himſelf, had by being overthrown and flying away loſt his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the Race is not to the ſwift. Eccleſ.

That this Civil War laſted two years, we find it written in the ſecond of Samuel the ſecond Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter reſteth ſtill in diſpute, and ſome of the Rabbins conceive that Iſhboſheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Iſhboſheth after this, and till ſuch time as there grew jealouſie between him and Iſhboſheth for Saul's Concubine: neither did the death of Iſhboſheth inſtantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happned, the ſame doth not certainly appear. Verſ. 10.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner ſlain by Joab, and of Iſhboſheth by Rechab and Baanah.

Abner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murthered; for Joab could not endure a companion in David's favour, and in the commandment of his Forces, by which he was grown ſo powerful, as David forbare to call him to account; for thus much he confeſſeth of himſelf: I am this day weak, and theſe men the Sons of Zerviah be too hard for me. In this ſort David complained after Abner's death, and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his Fathers houſe: and let them be ſubject to Ulcers, to the Leproſie, to lameneſs, to the ſword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withſtood the Ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have indangered David's Eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore David openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held being General of the Men of War, was of ſuch importance, that the Kings themſelves were fain to give them great reſpect, as hath been already ſhewed more at large. This Office Joab held in the Army of Judæ, and thought himſelf worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in Kindred, and had been partaker of all his adverſity; wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature ſo jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterward ſlew Amaſa his own Kinſman, and the Kings, upon the ſame quarrel, taking it in high diſdain to ſee him joyned with himſelf as Captain of the Hoſt of Juda; much leſs could he brook a ſuperiour, and ſuch a one as had ſlain his Brother, and been beaten himſelf in battel. But howſoever Joab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, David eſteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great Man in Iſrael, excuſing the overſight by which he might ſeem to have periſhed, by affirming that he died not like a fool, nor a Man vanquiſhed, But as a Man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaid he) diddeſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of Wit, nor want of Valour and Vertue in him whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyeth unawares, or whom ſubtilty in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all under the Sun are ſubject to worldly miſeries and miſadventures. Howſoever Iſhboſheth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his Estate, and with him all Israel were possest with great fear: insomuch as two of Ishbosheth's own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Ishbosheth, and presenting his Head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Ishbosheth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

§. IV.

Of the flourishing time of David's Kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrows given to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

WHen David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprise was upon the Jebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their Walls with the Blind and Lame of their City; which David soon after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the City of David) he became Lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Joshua, and after them almost 400. years: There are who expound this place otherwise. Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel, and that therefore till those (that is till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self I take it with Josephus, that they armed their Walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of David's attempt. For they that had held their City about 400. years against all the Children of Israel, Joshua, the Judges, and Saul: did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

2 Sam. 5.

When he had now possest himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadors and Presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other Concubines and married more Wives, by whom he had ten Sons in Jerusalem, and by his former Wives he had six in Hebron where he Reigned 7. years.

The Philistims hearing that David was now anointed King as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountred by David at two several times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

2 Sam. 5.

Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the City of David, which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the Son of Aminadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the City with Sacrifices, Musick, Dances, and all signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely that he forgat his regal dignity both in apparel and behaviour; and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and Streets: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision. But rather the abundant grief, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her Husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her Father and Brethren, out of whose ruins she conceived that the Son of Ishai had built this his greatness, together with the many new Wives and Concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despiteful terms, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or House of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a Man of War, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of Man, at the hand of Man and Beast. The Wars which David had made were just, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by bloodshed and terrour of their Wars, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the blessedness promised by our Saviour unto the peacemakers.

1 Chron. c. v. 3.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his Heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his Seed.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

SOon after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in hast. For it is written, accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philistæorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words. And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginal Note. This City of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsaria, set on the Frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Judæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such Frontier Town of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood the Hebrews call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first Book, and thirteenth Chap. This exposition is made plain and confirmed in the first of Chron. the 18.

The ſecond and third incounter and overthrow of the Philiſtims was at Gob a place near Geſar, and the laſt at Gath or Geth. And being now better aſſured of the Philiſtims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithſtanding in his adverſity he fought ſuccour, and left his Parents with him in truſt. But whether it were the ſame King or no it is not known.

The Rabins feign that Moab ſlew thoſe kinſfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time, but queſtionleſs David well knew how that Nation had bin always enemies to Iſrael, and took all the occaſions to vex them that were offered. And he alſo remembred that in the 23. of Deuter. God commanded Iſrael not to ſeek the peace or proſperity of the Moabites, which David well obſerved, for he deſtroyed two parts of all the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the Son of Rehob King thereof. The place is ſet down in the deſcription of the holy Land: to which I refer the Reader.

§. VI.

The War which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David ſmote alſo Hadadezer &c. as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates. Now whether the words [as he went to recover his border] be referred to David or Hadadezer it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article [he] hath relation to David, who finding Tohu oppreſt by Hadadezer, overthrew the one and ſuccoured the other. But the ancient and moſt received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any ſuch enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better caſe to have proceeded after his victory than before: ſeeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to purſue him, to take victuals and ſupplies from him, or to ſtop the paſſages of the Mountains upon him at his return.

Again, ſeeing David was either to paſs through a part of Arabia the Deſart, or by the Plains of Palmyrena, his Army conſiſting of Footmen, for the moſt, if not all: He had now both Horſe and Chariots good ſtore to carry his proviſions through thoſe uncultived places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Hieruſalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian Army, not bending his courſe towards the River Euphrates, but ſeeking to eſtabliſh his purchaces already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is ſaid.

The King of Syria Damaſcena, and of Damaſcus, whereof that region is ſo called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrown by the Iſraelites, fearing his own eſtate, and the loſs of his own Country which adjoyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadezer, ſent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his ſuccour: but theſe, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too ſoon for themſelves: for there periſhed of thoſe ſupplies 22000. This King of Damaſcus, Joſephus (out of Nicolaus an ancient Hiſtorian) calleth Adad, who was alſo of the ſame name and family as all thoſe other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatneſs, and ſo continued for ten deſcents, till they were extinguiſhed by the Aſſyrians, as is ſhewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damaſcus under his obedience, left a garriſon therein as he did in Edom: having alſo ſackt the adjoyning Cities of Betah, and Berai, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba; and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whoſe Country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the deſcription of the Holy land the Reader may perceive) ſent his Son Joram to congratulate this ſucceſs of David: partly becauſe he had War with Adadezer, and partly becauſe he feared David now victorious. He alſo preſented David with veſſels of Gold, Silver, and Braſs, all which together with the Golden Shields of the Aramites, and the beſt of all the ſpoils of other Nations David dedicated unto God at his return. 2 Sam. 8.
Junius tranſlated the words [clypeos aureos] by umbones, as if all the parts of the Targets were not of Gold but the boſſes only. The Septuagint call them Bracelets: Aquila, Golden Chains. But becauſe Roboam made Shields of Braſs in place of theſe of Adadezer, at ſuch time as Shicah the Ægyptian ſackt the Temple of Hieruſalem, it may be gathered thereby, that thoſe of Adadezer were Golden Shields.

This done David ſent Embaſſadors to Hanun King of the Ammonites to congratulate his eſtabliſh- 2 Sam. 1.
ment in his Fathers Kingdom: for David in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahaſh, the Father of Hanun. But this Ammonite being ill adviſed, and over-jealous of his eſtate, uſed David's Meſſengers ſo barbarouſly, and contemptuouſly (by curtailing their Beards, and their garments) as he thereby drew a War upon himſelf, which neither his own ſtrength, nor all the aids purchaſed could put off, or ſuſtain. For notwithſtanding that he had waged three and thirty thouſand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their Confederates; to wit, of the vaſſals of Adadezer twenty thouſand, and of Maachah and Iſhtob thirteen thouſand (for which he diſburſed a thouſand Talents of Silver) yet all theſe great Armies together with the ſtrength of the Ammonites, were by Joab and his brother Abiſhai eaſily broken and put to ruin: and that without any great loſs or ſlaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites alſo retreated into their Cities, the one holding themſelves within the Walls, the other in their Deſarts adjoyning, till Joab was returned to Hieruſalem.

Army, aſſembled his forces again, and ſent for all the companies that he could levy out of Meſopotamia, who under the command of Shobach paſſed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam*, on the South ſide thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, aſſembled all the ableſt Men of Iſrael and marched towards the Syrian Army in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia: to wit, at Helam, a place place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the 2 Sam. 10. South-west. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off Journey that ever he made) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also possest

* See c. 18. §. 2. himself of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this City was but one days Journey from Helam, and the River Euphrates. So had he two safe Retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. Horsemen, and 700. Chariots, together with Shobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers Footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of Footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. Horsemen, except they quitted their Horse and fought on Foot. So are the Chariots taken in this Battel, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them with the Conductors are included: so as there died of the Syrians in this War against David before he forc'd them to Tribute, 100000. Footmen, besides all their Horsemen and Waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the Party and Confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their Territory, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The King's Crown which weighed a Talent of Gold, garnished with precious Stones, David set on his own Head, and carried away with him the rest of the Riches and Spoil of the City. And though David stayed at Hierusalem, following the War of Uriah his Wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his Masters arrival. To the People he used extream rigor (if we may so call it being exercised against Heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with Harrows, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning Kilns, in which he baked Tile and Brick.

Of David's Troubles in his Reign, and of his Forces.

BUT as Victory begettth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodness: so did these Changes, in the Fortune and State of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Laws and Commandments. For having now no dangerous apparent Enemy (against whom he was wont to ask Counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires. For he was not only satisfied to take Uriah's Wife from him, and to use her by stealth: but he imbroidered his Adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving Order to his trusty Servant Joab to marshal him in the front or point of those Israelites, 2 Sam. 11. 14, 15. which gave an assault upon the Suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And, that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best Servants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of Happiness; and his days then to come were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden down sorrows began again to spring; and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witness of David's own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own errour, in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor Man's Sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he delivered him God's Justice together with his Mercy in the Tenour following; Now therefore the Sword shall never depart from thy 2 Sam. 12. vers. 9. & 10. House, &c. Because thou hast taken his Wife to be thy Wife, and hast slain Uriah with the Sword of the Children of Ammon. Soon after this David lost the Child of Adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own Son Amnon being in Love with his half Sister Thamar, by the advice of his Cousin German the Son of Shimeah David's Brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despightful manner. Two Years after which foul and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the Feast of his Sheep-shearing; not perchance in revenge of Thamar's Ravishment alone: but having it in his Heart to usurp the Kingdom; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his Affair greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one Brother having ravished his own Sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his own Brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Gessur, near Damascus, who was his Grandfather by the Mother, but a Heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the invention of Joab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his Son) was brought again: first to the King's favour, and then 2 Sam. 14. to his presence. He began instantly to practise against David his Father, seeking by the pretence of common Justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all Men, and by detracting from his Father's Equity, to win unto himself a popular Reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of David's sin.

The company which Absalom gathered at the 2 Sam. 15. first were but 200. Men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though impiously, the performance of a Vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of People from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the People (whose Hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled

And now when Treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred David's prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightened) holding himself upon the advantage of a Moun-

2 Sam. 17. tion between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his Father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy Wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy Wives in the sight of the Sun:
2 Sam. c. 12. v. 11. for thou didst it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun. He also gave advice to Absalom, that himself with an army of 12000 Men might be imployed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly been imbraced by Absalom, had not Hushai David's faithful
2 Sam. 17. v. 14. Servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom, that it was surer and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his Father: than by such a troop, which David's valour, and those of his attendants, might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by
2 Sam. 17. 23. the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishbosheth, himself in the War against David after Saul's death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi, the Son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom David for his Fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hanum's overthrow. In thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to David's assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Pallace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by Nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his Government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news 15.
brought him that Absalom hung by the hair of his head on a Tree, when he could not perswade the 16.

his own Servants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom 14.
he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; 2 Sam. 18. and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a Man that had lost a Son, but as one that had outlived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the Army. For first he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful Servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not only to not acknowledge so great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolvedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies and hated his Friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful Servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Absalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly he used this prevalent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himself publickly to his Men of War, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatning: And that will be 2 Sam. 19.
worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these overbold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good Intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and bronght him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa who commanded the Army of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Absalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

This

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face; but this remission was but external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsly accused and betrayed.

2 Sam. 19. 23.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his Son Chimham to attend the King.

2 Sam. 19. 38.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba, the Son of Bichri a Benjamite of the faction of the House of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest; and it seemeth that many of the People of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Army within three days, which he foreslowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai Joab's Brother, was sent after him, with David's Guard and best Soldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa near Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done he pursued Sheba, and finding him incloſed in Abel, assaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wise Woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his Head, and flung it to Joab over the Walls: which done, he retreated his Army to Jerusalem, and commanded as before all the Host of Israel.

2 Sam. 20. 10.

2 Sam. 20. 22.

The next act of David's, was the delivery of Saul's Sons or Kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung up in revenge of their Fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a Famine which had continued on the Land three Years, came by reason of Saul and his House; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanly, to rid himself of Saul's Line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his Father, as for his Oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King took the two Sons of Rispah whom she bare unto Saul, and the five Sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites.

2 Sam. 21.

Junius calls this Michol the Sister of her that was David's Wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her Husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David, when he slew Goliah in the Vally of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any human respect in the delivery of her Children, it is only known to God.

Now whereas the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the Wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same Kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliah, whose Spear was weighty as a Weavers Beam, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be understood by the Brother of Goliah: Goliah himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Saul's Children God secured the House of David, leaving no head unto Rebellion; so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against Foreign Enemies, by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that People of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all Men of mark, and great reputation in War. Over these were six Colonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Colonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the Brother of Joab, who in the War against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commanded half the Army, could not attain to the honour of the first Rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three Colonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness in Blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his own House, and his well approved services. All these Colonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the Field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principal Men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Captains and Colonels, (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37.) were the especial Men of War, and reckoned as David's worthies. The long Reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent Men of War, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the Sons of Zervia, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his Brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

2 Sam. 23. 8. &c.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. years, or thereabout, when the Posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbring the People, as in ostentation of his Power: in which he imployed Joab with other Captains of his Army, who after nine Months and twenty days travel, returned with the Account and Register of all the People, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin; whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof five hundred thouthousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven Years famine; three Months War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general Pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion of respect of persons, of which there perished seventy thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of Men; whereof he giveth us this Divine reason, 2 Sam. 14. For his mercies are great.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of David: Adonijah's faction: the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LAstly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the Arms of a young and well complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldest Son (Amnon and Absalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's Sons, and a Man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabe the Mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Salomon her Son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captain of his Guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice Men of War, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himself to the people. Those tydings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his Assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the horns of the Altar,
1 King. 1. whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these
1 Chron. c. 28. v. 1. intentions to good effect he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, all the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and Men of power; who repaired unto Jerusalem.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers Sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Salomon by name to be his Successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his Son, to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this work of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the work according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution. 1 Chron. 29. 9.

The King's proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of Silver, they added unto it seven thousand of Gold, and ten thousand of Silver, besides Brass, Iron and Jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of so religious a work. This business being well dispatched, a solemn feast with great Sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the Sons of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his Son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he uttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk 1 Kin. 2. 3. in his ways, and keep his statutes and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperity of his issues. For this done (saith God himself) 1 Kin. 1. 20. Thou shalt not want one of thy posterity to sit upon the throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saving that he fastened himself to Adonijah (his master yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he had enforced other Men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly strucken others with all, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence only of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meer jealousie of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked Men) raised up Benaiah the Son of Jehojadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slew the Captains of the host of Israel, and shed Blood of battel in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his Son Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also 1 King. 2. what Joab the Son of Zeruiah did to me, &c. 1 King. 2.

Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abſalom, contrary to the King's deſire, or by the proud words uſed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abſalom; or whether it were the publiſhing of David's Letter unto him for the killing of Uriah: thereby to diſgrace Salomon as deſcended of ſuch a Mother, the Scriptures are ſilent. True it is that thoſe great Men of War do oftentimes behave themſelves exceeding inſolently towards their Princes, both in reſpect of their ſervice done, as alſo becauſe they flatter themſelves with an opinion, that either their Maſters cannot miſs them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrown many a worthy Man otherwiſe deſerving great honour and reſpect.

He alſo gave order to Salomon, to rid himſelf of Shimei, who not long before had caſt Stones at David and curſed him to his face. And albeit by reaſon of his oath and promiſe David ſpared Shimei all the time himſelf lived, yet being duſt and in the grave he ſlew him, by the hand of Salomon his Son. Hence it ſeemeth that King Henry the ſeventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the eighth to execute Pool as ſoon as himſelf was buried, having made promiſe to the King of Spain when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor ſuffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

1 King. 2.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeild unto Salomon any ſuch great profit or aſſurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, and Rezin of Damaſcus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witneſs, were emboldened to enterprize upon Salomon, hearing that David ſlept with his Fathers, and that Joab the Captain of the hoſt was dead. Now when David had raigned in all forty years, to wit, in Hebron ſeven years, and in Jeruſalem three and thirty, he died.

For his perſon, he was of ſmall ſtature, but exceeding ſtrong. For his internal gifts and graces he ſo far exceeded all other Men, as putting his humane frailty apart, he was ſaid by God himſelf to be a Man according to his own heart. The Pſalms which he wrote witneſs his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Hieron to Paulinus. David Simonides noſter, Pindarus & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Sereno, Chriſtum lyra perſonat, & in decachordo Pſalterio ab inferis ſuſcitat reſurgentem. David (ſaith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Chriſt on his harp, and on a ten-ſtringed Pſalter he raiſeth him up riſing from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Chriſt more lightſomely and lively than all the reſt.

The book of the Pſalms, ſaith Glycas, were divided, ordered and diſtinguiſhed, by Ezekias: but whether all the Pſalms were written by David it is diverſly diſputed. For Athanaſius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers authors, anſwering the titles of the ſeveral Pſalms, as Moſes, Salomon, and the reſt hereafter named, and that only 73. Pſalms were compoſed by David himſelf, namely thoſe which are intituled ipſius David. For the 50. and 72. with the ten that follow are beſtowed on Aſaph the Son of Barachia, eleven other on the Sons of Korah, and eleven are aſcribed to Moſes, to wit, the 89. and the 10. following, and ſo they are intituled in the old Hebrew copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) ſtile them otherwiſe. The ſuppoſed nine authors of theſe Pſalms which David wrote not, Sixt. Senenſis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moſes, whom Aben Ezra contrary to Hierome, maketh one of David's Singers) Aſaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three Sons of Chore. But S. Chryſoſtome makes David the ſole author of all the Pſalms, and ſo doth S. Auguſtine, reaſoning in this manner. Although (ſaith he) ſome there are that aſcribe thoſe Pſalms only unto David, which are over written ipſius David, and the reſt intituled ipſi David to others, this opinion (ſaith he) Voce Evangelica ſalvatoris ipſius refutatur, ubi ait quòd ipſe David in ſpiritu Chriſtum dixerit eſſe ſuum Dominum, quoniam Pſalmus 109. ſic incipit: Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voice of the Goſpel refutes this opinion, where it ſaith, that David himſelf in the Spirit called Chriſt his Lord, becauſe the 109. Pſalm begins thus, The Lord ſaid unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Laſtly, his teſtimonies are uſed both by Chriſt and the Apoſtles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that ſucceeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the firſt of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the ſeveral parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it ſeems written by theſe three Holy Men.

Conſtantine Manaſſes hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the ſiege, fought for ſuccour from David, and that he ſtayed neuter in that War. But it ſeemeth that Manaſſes did miſcaſt the time 'twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samſon Judges of Iſrael, about the Worlds year 2848. and David died in the year 2991.

c. 17. §. 6, 7. In his Annales tranſlated out of Greek into Latin by Joannes Leunclaius.

Of the treaſures of David and Salomon.

HIS Treaſures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the firſt of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thouſand talents of Gold, and a thouſand thouſand talents of Silver, and of braſs and Iron paſſing all weight, which is more than any King of the World poſſeſt beſides himſelf, and his Son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thouſand three hundred thirty and three cartload and a third of a cartload of Silver, allowing two thouſand weight of Silver or ſix thouſand pound ſterling to every cartload, beſides threeſcore and ſeventeen Millions of French Crowns, or of our Money twenty three Millions and a thouſand pound: a matter but for the teſtimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him it doth not appear, ſeeing that the Judges had not any treaſure, nor any ſoveraign power to make levies: but when they went to the Wars, they were followed by ſuch Voluntiers as the ſeveral Tribes by turns gave them: ſeeing alſo that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philiſtims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part poſſeſt by his enemies.

Ver. 14.

Therefore it were not amiſs to conſider how David within the ſpace of not very many years, might amaſs up ſuch mighty treaſures. For though parſimony be it ſelf a great revenue, yet needs there muſt have been other great means. It ſeems that he made the uttermoſt profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Euſebius in his ninth book book and last Chapter de præparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it Achanis) a City of Arabia, and from thence sent Men to dig for Gold in the Island Urphe, which Ortelius thinks, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island is in the Red Sea; from whence saith this Eupolemus, they brought Gold into Jury. Pineda lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather great riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitful vallies near Jordan in Traconitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other Countries bordering the Israelites. These Demains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of Captives, which he took in his Wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1 Chron. 17. that Jehonathan was over his Treasures in the field, in the Villages, in the Cities, in the Towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the Vineyards; and Sabdi over the store of the Wine; Baal Hanan over the Olive Trees, and Joash over the store of the Oyl, also that he had Herdmen that had charge over his cattel, both in the high lands, and in the Plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Asses. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattle the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of Pharaoh that he spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their Servants, to be Rulers over his Cattel. Gen. 47. We read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattel, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we read 2 Chron. 26. it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof it were needless to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not imployed in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the Tributes and impositions which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable Presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tebu and others) we may add the great spoils which he found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head-money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head-Money, every Man rich or poor paying half a Sickle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summ in that Kingdom: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventy thou-1 Chron. 21. sand fighting Men were numbred by Joab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confess is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practice. And by these means might he be able to leave those huge Treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great mass of Gold and Silver left by David, the least part was his own in private, and so will it appear the less wonderful that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the Temple three thousand Talents of Gold, and seven thousand Talents of Silver, a great summ: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the Treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual encrease, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshua. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priest and Levites) were partly raised out of the head-money before mentioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the People which re- Numb. 31. mained at home, had the other half; whereby all the 27. Country received benefit of the Victory, yet so that the Souldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchace was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand Women being taken, the Army had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had Num. 31. other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen 40. thousand given to the Army were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means the lesser that the Army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestical affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was always certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some especial commandment, as when all the Gold, and Silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when af- Jos. 6. 19. ter the victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one Man, all Jewels, Bracelets, Ear-rings, and the like, were offered up, as vo- Numb. 31. luntary Presents. 50.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not these Treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; 1 Chron. c. and of all that was purchased by so many victories, 26. v. 27. as they obtained against the bordering Nations. & 28. For that this Treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains in other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summs of an hundred thousand Talents of Silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industry.

A Talent of Gold is 770. French Crowns, 1 King. 10. 14.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly Revenues with his Tributes six hundred sixty six Talents of Gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his Ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentyeth year of his Reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judæa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyra, of 1 King. c. 9. v. 20. & c. 10. v. 29.

Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him Tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hevites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

Into this flourishing Estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after forty years Reign, and seventy years of life, died in a good age, full of days, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvelous quantity of Treasures, in so much as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of the Maccabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then Besieging Jerusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding Mass of Gold and Silver therein. And it was an ancient custom to bury Treasure with the Dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did bury so much Treasure in his Fathers Grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the People, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it not withall considered that his want of Money grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of Burial. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Ulika) they remained within these thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed upon them.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of petty Principalities; namely, Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his Kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Ægyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's Wife. Gen. 20.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumæa, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his Wife: as his Father had done Sara. Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the Government was turned into Aristocratical. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time. Judg. 16. 1 Sam. 18. 29. 1 Sam. 21. 11.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive Servant, what time the seeking of his Servant was the loss of his Life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palæstin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the Wars of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place. 1 King. 1.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regal name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their Government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of Soveraignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Græcians of Doris, a Region between Phocis and the Mountain Oeta, sought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any Victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own forces, and putting on the habit of a common Soldier, entred the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountred, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Near the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclidæ, the Son of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his Successours were called Agidæ, for many years after. He restored the Laconians to their former liberty: He overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him Tribute: He condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclavi came the word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seised upon the Country of Illyria and made it their own by Conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called called themselves by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made Servants to their Neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in Bondage began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now currant through many Countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. year of David, and say that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this Race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth year of Salomon. Euſeb. in Chron.

In the tenth year of Acheſtratus Androclus the third Son of Codrus assisted by the Iones, built Epheſus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Isle of Samos to his Territory was slain by the Carians whose Country he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the Gates of Epheſus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next Province to Epheſus on the Sea Coast of Asia the less) he inlarged his Dominions upon the Æoles, which joyneth to Ionia: and that his Posterity governed the Cities of Epheſus and Erythræ by the name of Basilidæ in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponneſus, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. years.

The City of Epheſus became exceeding famous: First, for the Temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. Pillars of Marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the work being first set out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian Faith, of which Timothy was Bishop; to whom, and to the Epheſians Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intituled. The other City possest by Androclus in Æolis was also universally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythræa: who lived seven hundred and forty years before Christ born. Saint Augustin avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greek Copy certain verses of this Propheteſs: which began (as Saint Augustin changed them into Latin) in these words: Jeſus Chriſtus Dei filius ſalvator. Jesus Christ Son of God the Saviour.

Plin. l. 2. c. 58. & l. 7. c. 37.

About the time that Joab belieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Ægypt, the same that was Father-in-Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the City of Magneſia in Asia the less founded, the same which is seated upon the River Meander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the best Horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan, Et Magnetis equis, Minyæ gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, saying that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous Scholar of Isocrates. Serv. in Æneid. 3. Strabo l. 5.

Euſebius and Cassiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much mistaken. For the Father of Dido was Metinus the Son of Badezor Brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. years.

In this time also Acaſtus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracy of ten years. Some Writers make it probable that the Æolians led by Gras, the Grand nephew of Oreſtes, who possest the City and Island of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. year of David, Hiram began to Reign in Tyre, according to Josephus, who saith that in his twelfth year Salomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Josephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if he knew not how at all to cast any Account. For it is manifest that Hiram sent Messengers, and Cedars to David, soon after his taking of Jeruſalem, which was in the very beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet he had Reigned only seven years in Hebron, over the House of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had Reigned above 30. years before Salomon; unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian Records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest. Euſeb. in Chron. Herod. in vit. Hom. & Strab. l. 14. *Antiq. 8. & cont. CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the eſtabliſhing of Salomon : of birth-right, and of the cauſe of Adonijah's death, and of Salomon's Wiſdom.

SAlomon, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to Reign over Juda and Iſrael, in the year of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God : he was alſo called Jedidias, or Theophilus, by Nathan, becauſe the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomon's anointing, diſpatched Embaſſadors toward him, Congratulating his eſtabliſhment : a cuſtom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like ſort ſalute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

2 Sam. 10.

The beginning of Salomon was in Blood, though his Reign were peaceable. For ſoon after David's death, he cauſed his Brother Adonijah to be ſlain by Benaiah the Son of Jehoiada, taking occaſion from Adonijah his deſiring by Berſheba, that the young Maid Abiſhag, which lay in David's boſom in his latter days, to keep him warm, might be given him. Whatſoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder Brother, and ſought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is ſaid that a word is enough to the wiſe, and he that ſees but the Claw, may know whether it be a Lion or no : ſo it may ſeem that to the quick-ſighted wiſdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah's, was a demonſtration of a new Treaſon. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King : whence Achitophel wiſhed Abſalon to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royalty. And David after that wrong determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but ſhut them up, and they remained widowed untill their death. And this it ſeems was the depth of Iſhboſheth's quarrel againſt Abner, for having his Fathers Concubine. And ſome ſignification of this cuſtom may ſeem too in the words of God by Nathan to David ; I have given thee thy maſters houſe, and thy maſters wives. And in the words of Saul, upbraiding Jonathan that he had choſen David to the ſhame of the nakedneſs of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was ſome reference in this purpoſe of Adonijah, to marry with her that was always preſent with David in his latter days, and who belike knew all that was paſt, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be divers farther occaſions, as either that he would learn ſuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perſwade her to forge ſome ſtrange tale about David's laſt Teſtament, or any thing elſe that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

2 Sam 20. 3.

1 King. 2. 15.

As for the right of an elder Brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the Law of Nations, and with the cuſtoms of the Jews : yet the Kings of the Jews were ſo abſolute, as they did therein, and in all elſe what they pleaſed. Some examples alſo they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to uſe this paternal authority in transferring the birthright to a younger Son : namely of Jacob's diſheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any Portion of the other Brethren) to Joſeph : of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appears by the words of Berſabe and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was neceſſary to confirm, or that the refuſal of the people had authority to fruſtrate the elder Brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the ſtories of the Jews. It is ſaid indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal : that is, they acknowledged and eſtabliſhed him. For that he was King long before no Man can doubt. In like manner elſewhere the phraſe of chuſing or making their King, is to be expounded : as where in the prohibition, that they ſhould not make themſelves a King, it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt make him King whom the Lord ſhall chuſe.

Deut. 28. 30.

But to proceed with the Acts of Salomon : at the ſame time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himſelf alſo of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had adviſed him : he diſplaced alſo the Prieſt Abiather, who took part with Adonijah againſt him : but in reſpect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and becauſe he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he ſpared his life. And thus being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, he took the Daughter of Vaphres King of Ægypt to Wife : for ſo Euſebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thouſand ſacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands ; Salomon chooſeth wiſdom, which pleaſed God. And God ſaid unto him, Becauſe thou haſt asked this thing, and haſt not asked for thy ſelf long life, neither haſt thou asked riches for thy ſelf, nor haſt asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words : by which we may inform our ſelves what deſires are moſt pleaſing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life, in reſpect of our ſelves, cannot but proceed of ſelf-love, which is the root of all impiety : the deſire of private riches is an affection of covetouſneſs which God abhorreth ; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the Sword out of Gods hand, and to diſtruſt his Juſtice. And in that it pleaſed God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his Enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his Brothers ſlaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God. But becauſe Salomon deſired wiſdom only, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule Men, it pleaſed God to give him withall that which he deſired not. And I have alſo given thee (ſaith God) that which thou haſt not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wiſdom our Commentators ſtretch to almost all kinds of Learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of Plants and living Creatures the Scripture testifieth, though 1 Kin. 4. 33. 2 King. 3. 9. no doubt the chief excellency of Salomon's wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the Controversie between the two Harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomon's Buildings and Glory.

HE then entred into League with Hiram, King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his Materials, for the King's Pallace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his Father David, and another from God.
1 Chr. 22. 6. For like as it is written of David that He called Salomon his Son, and charged him to build a House for Tost. 9. 26. in 1 Chron. the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine Precept to these words, Behold; a Son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an House for my Name.

1 King. c. 6. v. He began the Work of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth Year of his Reign, at which time also he prepared his Fleet at Esiongaber to trade for Gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a Work. For that the Temple was in building, while his Fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the Pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim Trees brought from
1 Chron. 28. 29. Ophir. Of this most glorious Building, of all the particulars (whereof the Form and Example was given by God himself) many learned Men have written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that Building, Salomon employed thirty thousand Carpenters, ten thousand every Month by Course: he also used eighty thousand Masons in the Mountain, and seventy thousand Labourers that bare Burdens, which, it is conceived,
1 King. 5. he selected out of the Proselytes, besides three thousand three hundred Masters of his Work, so as he paid and employed in all one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred Men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skilful in hewing Timber than the Israelites, may (as I think)
1 King. 5. vers. 9. be included. For Hiram caused his Servants to bring down the Cedars and Firrs from Libanon to the Sea, and thence sent them in Raffs to Joppe or the next Port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the Overseers, were Strangers, and as it seemeth the Vas-
1 King. 5. 11. sals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Ægypt. In recompence of all this Timber and Stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand Measures of Wheat, and twenty Measures of pure Oyl yearly. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth Book of his Preparation the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Salomon's Letter to Suron (which was the same as Huram or Hiram) King of Tyre in these words.

REX Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cuique mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my Father's Friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my Father David, the Kingdom: and when my Father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created Heaven and Earth, he commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this Answer.

SUron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia rex, Salomoni regi salutem. Lectis literis gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrosque ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessariis non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SUron of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: when I read your Letters, I gave God thanks, who hath installed you in your Father's Kingdom. And because you write, that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build God's Temple, I have sent unto you fourscore thousand Men, and a Master Builder a Tyrian, born of a Jewish Woman, a Man admirable in Building. You will be careful that all Necessaries be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us. Jos. Ant. l. 8. c. 2.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus's his time as himself affirmeth, and to be seen, saith he, tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own as in the Tyrian Annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram either by Message or by Writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus, 1 King. 5. from the 1. v. to the 9. or Josephus set it down, but, so that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Ægypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors upon Salomon find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Ægypt, gave Salomon the Title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius; I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last Chapter of that ninth Book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth Book and second Chapter of the Jews Antiquities: it being a vain Title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean Persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that Name for his noble Qualities, as much or more than for his Mightiness.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and House of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble Wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or Munition of Hierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it setmeth in favour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar which the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the Sword and burnt their City. The place and Territory he gave Salomon's Wife for a Dowry. And it is probable that because Salomon Jos. Ant. l. 8. c. 2.

was then busied in his magnificent Buildings, and could not attend the War, that he entreated his Father-in Law to rid him of those Neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Ægyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his Son Rehoboam's time Sheshack this Man's Successor did sack Jerusalem it self.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan; and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolemie's Thameron in the Desart of Juda (or as Josephus thinks Palmyra in the Desart of Syria,) which Palmyra because it stood on the utmost Border of Salomon's Dominion to the North-east of Libanus, and was of David's Conquest when he wan Damascus; it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most Cost, and fortified it with the best Art, that that Age had.

Joseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2. Josephus calls this place Thadamora, by which Name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his Book of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour it was honoured with his Name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great Charge of Building Salomon raised Tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty Talents of Gold received from Hiram's Servants, Salomon offered Hiram twenty Towns in or near the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitful and marish ground Hiram, refused them, and thereof was the Territory called Chabull.

These Towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possest by Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. However it were, it is true that Salomon in his twenty first Year fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a Journey into Syria Zobah and established his Tributes; the first and last War (if in that Expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his Life. He then visited the Border of all his Dominions passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Eloth, the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red Sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomon's sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomon's Riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Africk.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India with whom Hiram joyned in that Voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert Seamen. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom and was conquered by David, did the Fleet pass on to the East India, which was not far off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in Gold: witness the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia; and recover a great quantity from thence, and with less labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The Return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty Talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written four hundred and fifty Talents: whereof thirty Talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of Men, and four hundred and twenty Talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came clear. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six Talents of Gold, that Summ, as I take it, is of other Receipts of Salomon's which were yearly, and which came to him besides these Profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the Land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy Return to Jerusalem from the East Indies than in three Years; and that Tharsis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean; hath been already declared in the first Book. C. 8. §. 9, 10. & 5. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange Conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batica would fain have Gades or Calismalis, in old times called Tartessius, which is the South-west corner of that Province, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his Gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Country, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharsis and Tartessius. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three Year ere they, that took Ship in the Red Sea, should return from the East Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry letts, in the digging and refining of the Mettal, and in their other Traffick, and in their Land-carriages between Jerusalem and the Red Sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we have no need to make Salomon's Men to go many thousand Miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran Sea, and so (besides many wonderful inconveniences and terrible Navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome Land-carriage between Jerusalem and the Red Sea through dry, desart, and thievish Countries: and within 30. Mile of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other Haven in Salomon's own Country, have laden and unladen their Ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia being swallowed up in the Atlantick Ocean hindered Salomon's Ships from passing through the Straits of Gibraltar: for this he alledgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Salomon's time, or that thereby the Straits of Gades were filled with mudd and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterran Sea: or that this indraught where the Sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channel, should be filled with mudd, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood: or that Salomon's Ships being in the Red Sea, should neglect the Golden Mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red Sea, than any in Spain) to seek Gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies and inhabits some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no less quantity of Gold (the small Territory which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The

De rebus Sal. l. 4. c. 12. 11. The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharsis the City of Cilicia was cast out in the Mediterran Sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three days swimming above twelve thousand English Miles, along the Mediterran Seas, and so through the Straits of Gades, and along all the huge Seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that so he might have perhaps some six Miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninevie. This Conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red Sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the Sea full of Weeds) for the Red Sea. But in Jonas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for Weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own Rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange Miracles without any need. For this long Voyage of the Whale finished in three days, is a greater Miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the Belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this Miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his own Rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova singenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore to leave this Man in his Dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our Story of Salomon.

Ap. P.

As it appears he took Ship at Japho or Joppe. c. 1. Vers. 3.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Salomon, (as it seems from Arabia Felix, and not as some think from Æthiopia) and her rich Presents, and Salomon's reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult Questions, those are set down at large in the text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicaules, the Successour (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Ægyptian Kings which succeeded Mineus the Founder of Memphis; adding that after this Ægyptian, and the Father-in-Law of Salomon, the Name of Pharaoh was left off in Ægypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Ægypt and Æthiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the Father-in-Law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred Years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

Joseph. ant. 8. 1. 2.

2 Kin. c. 23. & 2 Chron. cap. 25. Jer. c. 46. Vers. 2.

It is also written of Salomon that he kept in Garrisons fourteen thousand Chariots and twelve thousand Horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty Measures of fine Flower, threescore Measures of Wheat, one hundred Sheep, besides Stags and fallow Deer, Bugels and Fowl; four thousand stalls of Horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand Horsemen of his Guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many Horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teams, and in every team ten Horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any Man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcol, or than Darda, to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Doran the Sons of Hemon. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many Acts of Salomon's were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil Causes and not Ecclesiastical; therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into God's Book.

§. IV.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things; so had he no scarcity of Women. For besides his seven hundred Wives he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his People should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Ægypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doating, his Wives turned his Heart after other Gods, as Ashteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the Masters of his Works, who by the Ordinance of God tare from his Son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the Territory he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, qua ipse non fecit. God in punishing sinners, useth the sins of others, which he himself wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the Reign of Salomon (as in times of long Peace) were few memorable Actions by him performed, excepting his Buildings with other Works of Magnificence and that great Indian Voyage already mentioned. Forty Years he reigned: how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of David before and after Salomon's Birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the Years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely Year of his Nativity. Seven Years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth Year he took Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the Year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth Year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the Year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had Wars with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs have held him five Years, considering that the Aramites of Damasco raised War against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of these Wars, he had the entire Victory. Neither is it likely that these Services occupied any longer time, because in those days and places there were no Wintering Camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the Year, Kings went forth to War, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the Spoil of the Enemies Country, partly upon the private Provision which every Souldier made for himself. The 17. Year of David in which he took Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the Year following to have begun the War with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to trial of a Battel (for Joab after the Victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that War having taken up all the Summer. Davia's personal expedition against the Aramites wherein he brought all the Tributaries of Hadadezer under his own Allegiance, appears manifestly to have been the next Year's Work, wherein he did cut off all means of Succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the twentieth Year of David's Reign, and about the fiftieth of his Life, in which he sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finished the War of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Uriah's Wife. So one half of David's Reign was very prosperous: in the other half he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God, for his foul and bloudy offence.

Now very manifest it is that in the Year after the death of that Child, which was begotten in Adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout, when he began to reign at the decease of his Father, as being begotten in the 21. Year of his Father's Reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two years passed ere Absalom slew his Brother Amnon; three years ere his Father pardoned him; and two years more ere he came into the King's presence. After this he prepared Horses and Men, and laid the Foundation of his Rebellion, which seems to have been one Years Work. So the Rebellion it self with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seem to have been in the thirtieth Year of David's Reign.

Whether the three Years of Famine should be reckoned apart from the last Years of War with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining Years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three Years of Famine, for four years of War, and for numbring the People, with the Pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmity, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seems that the War with the Philistims, was but one Years Work, and ended in three or four Fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This War the Philistims undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the Tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by David's old Age, for he fainted now in the Battel, and was afterwards hindered by his Men from exposing himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven Years of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great Men of War died (being of his own Age) whereby the stirring Spirit of Adonijah found little Succour in the broken Party of Joab the Son of Zerviah.

1 King. c. 2. v. 9. & c. 3. v. 7. At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise Man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a young Child; for nineteen Years of Age might well agree with either of these two Speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomon's professing himself a Child, that he was but eleven years old when he began to reign. Of these Rabbi Salomon seems the first Author, whom others of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that 2 Sam. 15. 7. which is said of Absalom's Rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understand as years of David's Reign. But whereas Rehoboam the Son of Salomon was one and forty years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himself but a Child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their Ages being no greater, (if Salomon who reigned forty years) were but eleven years old when his Reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allows eighty years of Reign to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this Opinion construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the Years of Salomon's Life. But by such reckoning he should have been forty years old at his Father's death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had won Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the forty years remembred in Absalom's Rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between David's first Anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedness, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latine Translation) four years; which passed between the return of Absalom to Jerusalem and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomon's Writings.

THere remain of Salomon's Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good Life, and correcteth Manners, in the second the vanity of Humane Nature, in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled the Wisdom of Salomon, (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof:) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri Sapientiæ (saith Hierom) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Book of Wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, savoureth of the Grecian Eloquence; and of the same Opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct fore-telling of the Passion of Christ in these words. Circumveniamus justum quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous for he is unpleasing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the Son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the Remedies of all Diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled down, because the People neglecting help from God by Prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Salomon's Books of Invocations and Inchantments to cure Diseases, and expel evil Spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though as I conceive, rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the Root in Salomon's Ring dispossest divers persons of evil Spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received wisdom from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his only service, he built the

the first and most glorious Temple of the World: he that was made King of Israel and Judea, not by the Law of nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the World, and the giver of all goodness, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the World had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner. Salomon raigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a Flood! Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth. Thou didst bow thy loyns to Women, and wast overcome by thy body, thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posterity, and hast brought wrath upon thy Children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

NEar the beginning of Salomon's raign, Agelaus the third of the Heraclida in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedemon; and soon after Sylvius Alba the fourth of the Sylvii, swayed those Kingdoms: Laosthenes then governing Assyria: Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the six and twentieth of Salomon's raign Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliastrus succeeded, and raigned seventeen years, after Mercator's accompt, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his Sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Ant. lib. 3. Theophilus Antiochenus against Autolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram, and the raign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shisak (as our English Geneva terms him) began to govern in Ægypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sesachis; Josephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus; Eusebius in the column of the Ægyptian Kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrews Susac. Josephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproveth it as an errour in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I have spoken already in the Story of the Ægyptian Princes: only in this he was reproved that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the Air, cast his head continually back upon the two fore-most wheels next him; which Sesostris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion; to whom the captive King answered, that in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddainly turned down-ward and under all: which when Sesostris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Ægyptian Kings preceding. Hist. Miscel. l. 17.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomon's Successors until the end of Jehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboam's Idolatry.

REhoboam the Son of Salomon by Nahama an Ammoniteſſe, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Ægypt, since he fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quàm metui; So should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took three days to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the judgment to discern of counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all Men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those grave and advised Men, that served his Father, who perswaded him by all means to satisfy the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and favorites, not only to continue on the backs of his Subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsly of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unsupportable loads on them. But as it appeared by the success, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it self: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the help, and not for the harm of Subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twisted and forged by love only; His witless parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and inabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboam's designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no ſooner arrived, than elected King of Iſrael: the people crying out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the Son of Iſhai. Now though themſelves, even all the Tribes of Iſrael, had conſented to David's anointing at Hebron the ſecond time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his fleſh: yet now after the manner of Rebells, they forgat both the bonds of nature, and their duty to God, and, as all alienated reſolved hearts do, they ſerved themſelves for the preſent with impudent excuſes. And now overlate, and after time, Rehoboam ſent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a Man moſt hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they inſtantly beat to death with ſtones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all ſpeed, and recovered Jeruſalem, where preparing to invade Iſrael, with an hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen Men, Shemai in the perſon of God commanding to the contrary, all was ſtaied for the preſent. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this ſide, and Penuel on the other ſide of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exerciſe of one Religion would alſo joyn the peoples hearts again to the Houſe of David; and having in all likelihood alſo promiſed the Ægyptians to follow their Idolatry: he ſet up two Calves of Gold for the Children of Iſrael to worſhip, impiouſly perſwading them that thoſe were the Gods, or at leaſt by theſe he repreſented thoſe Gods, which delivered them out of Ægypt: and refuſing the ſervice of the Levites, he made Prieſts fit for ſuch gods. It muſt needs be that by baniſhing the Levites which ſerved David and Salomon through all Iſrael, Jeroboam greatly inriched himſelf: as taking into his hands all thoſe Cities which were given them by Moſes and Joſhua; for as it is written, The Levites left their ſuburbs, and their poſſeſſion, and came to Juda, &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Iſrael for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecy and miracles impugned ſufficiently when it firſt began; but the affections maintaining it, were ſo ſtrong that neither Prophecy nor Miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the authority of Abia, who from the Lord had firſt promiſed unto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he ſtretched it over the Altar, which alſo clave aſunder, according to the ſign, which the Man of God had given by the commandment of God, who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obſtinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the ſafeſt courſe in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forſook God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Miniſters taught them, was by a modern Hiſtorian compared with the policies of late Ages, obſerving well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodiè (ſaith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, præſenteſq; utilitates ſibi tanquàm ultimum finem conſtituunt, cauſam quam vocant ſtatus in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipſa tuenda, promovenda, conſervanda, ampliandâ, nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda, ſi juſtitia honeſtatiſq; leges ſubvertendæ, ſi religio ipſa peſſundanda, ſi denique omnia jura divina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nihil per fas nefaſq; relinquendum cenſent, cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipſos, modò id, quod ère ſua eſſe ſibi perſuadent, obtineant, ac ſi nullus ſit qui talia curet, caſtigareve poſſit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themſelves, as their utmoſt end and ſcope, their own commodity and preſent profit, are wont to alledge the caſe of ſtate forſooth, as the principal point to be regarded: for the good of the ſtate, for advancing, preſerving, or encreaſing of the ſtate, they think they may do any thing. If they mean to oppreſs their neighbour, to over-turn all laws of juſtice and honeſty, if religion it ſelf muſt go to wrack, yea if all rights of God and Man muſt be violated, they will try all courſes, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing; let all go to ruine, what care they, ſo long as they may have what they would; as who ſhould ſay, there were no God that would offer to meddle in ſuch matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of raggione del ſtato, did ſerve as well to uphold, as at the firſt it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amazia the Prieſt of Bethel, counſelled the Prophet Amos, not to propheſie at Bethel; For (ſaid he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground even Jehu that had maſſacred the Prieſts of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wiſe depart from that politick ſin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, which made Iſrael to ſin. It was reaſon of ſtate that perſwaded the laſt famous French King Henry the fourth to change his religion; yet the Proteſtants whom he forſook obeyed him, but ſome of the Papiſts whom he followed murdered him. So ſtrongly doth the painted vizzor of wiſe proceeding delude even thoſe that know the ſoul face of impiety lurking under it, and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehu and all the Kings of Iſrael had, and were themſelves, very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was puniſhed by Seſac: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Jeroboam was occupied in ſetting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other ſide having now little hope to recover the Provinces loſt, ſtrengthened the principal places remaining with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Judah and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Ægyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only faſtned himſelf, but withal invited them to invade Judæa: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of David and Salomon, which might now eaſily be had, ſeeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judæans. So as by thoſe two ways (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of religion, and invitation of foregin force, Jeroboam hoped to ſettle himſelf in the ſeat of Iſrael, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatry in a few years after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam alſo having, as he thought, by fortifying divers Places, aſſured his eſtate, forſook the Law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his raign, Seſac or Shiſhac before ſpoken of, being now King of Ægypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumæa, as Jeroboam, were familiar and his inſtruments, entred Judæa with twelve thouſand Chariots, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe, beſides foot-men, which Joſephus numbers at four hundred thouſand. This Army was compounded of four Nations, Ægyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cuſites. The Lubæans were Lybians, the next bordering Region to Ægypt, on the Weſt ſide. The Cuſites were were of Petræa, and of the Desart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Juda. The Succæans, according to Junius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodítæ, mentioned often in Pliny, Ptolomy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward about six hundred English mile from the best and Maritimate part of Ægypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succai were those Troglodítæ, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomy calls Arabes Ægyptii or Ichthyophagi, which possess that part of Ægypt between the Mountains called Alabastrini, and the Red Sea far nearer Ægypt, and readier to be levied than those removed Savages of the Troglodítæ.

2 Chron. 12. 2 Kings 14. Annot in 12. Chron. Plin l. 6. c. 29. Ptol. Asiæ tab. 3. Cap. 47. v. 23.

With this great and powerful Army, Sesac invaded Judæa, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it self, of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoil, carrying away (besides other Treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian War: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of Brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Siracides calleth The foolishness of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Ægypt claimed the soveraignty of Judæa, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the Words of God, where promising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Ægypt, in these words. Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judæans) shall be his Servants, that is, the Servants of Sesac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam raigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sesac notwithstanding, he continued the War against Jeroboam all his life time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58. years, and raigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Governours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastrartus or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fifth of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines raigned Sylvius Alba and Sylvius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylvii.

Euseb. Chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses Sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to govern Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus the Son of Baleastartus recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Usurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battail between Jeroboam and Abija, with a Corollary of the examples of Gods judgments.

Abijah the Son of Rehoboam, inherited his Father's Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thousand; both Armies joyned near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side five hundred thousand, the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron, soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who raigned in all 22. years. Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he raigned but three years and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were. 2 Chron. 16. 23.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the Sins of Salomon in his Son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolater and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Ægyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Ægyptian Sesac. For the Son Abijah was able to levy four hundred thousand Men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand, God giving Spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before and at the instant delivered by Prophets; so the same just God who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason in these and other the afflictions of Israel, always the causes are set down, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his Son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Ægypt, because the people of Juda made images, high places and groves, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Jeroboam was punished in himself and his posterity for the Golden Calves that he erected. Joram had all his Sons slain by the Philistims, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flux, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Jezabel were slain, the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sins in all after times, and in these our days by the same Famine, Plagues, War, loss, vexation, death, sickness, and calamities, howsoever the wise Men of the World raise these effects no higher than to 2 Sam. 21. 1.

2 Chron. 14. TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the Altars dedicated to strange Gods, with their Images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own Mother who was an Idolatress, but deposing her from her Regency, brake her Idol, stampt it, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of War in the leisure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabiani bordering Judæa, and with such a multitude entred the Territory of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Nation either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Judæans Zerah of Æthiopia with an host of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountred with an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand, levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the spoil both of their Cities and Camp.

2 Chron. 15. 16.

2 Chron. 14. 9.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian I have *proved already, and were it but the length between Æthiopia and Judæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Ægypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these invaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judæans in following their Victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all Men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Besor, which David past over when he surprised the Amalekites or Arabians, this proveth sufficiently that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier Town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Judæa, from all parts of Æthiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoils which Asa took, as the Cattel, Camels, and Sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoining, and not far off, and not unknown Æthiopians. And if it be objected that these desart Countries can hardly yield a million of Men fit for the Wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Desart which compass two parts of the Holy Land, should yield ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides it answereth to the Promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Israel, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

3 Chron. 14.

Baasha a King of Israel, began to Reign in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great Victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to joyn with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Jerusalem towards Samaria.

This War began according to the Letter of the Scriptures in the 36. year of Asa his Reign: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. year of Asa, therefore could not Baasha begin this War in the 35. of Asa his Reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda and Israel: for so many years it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Asa. It may seem strange that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand good Soldiers, did not easily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himself against Zerah being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda and as much disheartened the enemies. Questionless there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands in the late service against Zerah, had caused many Mens private businesses to lie undispatched, whereby the people being now intentive to the culture of their Lands and other Trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, chusing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardness of the people might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his Forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the Treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederary with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his Successors after him ever gave over till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entered into Nephthalim without resistance, he spoiled divers principal Cities thereof, and enforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Asa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done Benhadad who loved neither party, being loaden with the spoils of Israel, and the Treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strucken with the grievous pains of the Gout in his Feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the Ghost when he had Reigned 41. years.

2 Chron. 16.

There lived with Asa Agesilaus the sixth of the Heraclidæ, and Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his Successors were afterward called Bacidæ. Astartus and Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus took revenge on his Brother Phelletes, for the murther of Ithobalus Priest of the Goddess Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latins. Pyrithiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis Reigned in Ægypt; who dying in the 36. year of Asa, left Cheops his Successor that Reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Joas.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the Reign of Asa.

IN the Reign of Asa, the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent Commotions, which might have reduced the Ten Tribes unto their former Allegeance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickedness of Jeroboam had, in his latter days, the sentence of heavy Vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sin of Salomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One Son Jeroboam had, among others, in whom only God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable Testimony of the peoples love, by their general Mourning and Lamentation at his death; and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approabation of God himself.

After the loss of this good Son, the ungodly Father was soon taken away: a miserable Creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruin hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loth he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the World was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the Son of Jeroboam, Reigned in the second and third years of Asa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his Fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the second of Asa, whose third year was the first of Baasha; so that perhaps this Nadab injoyed not his Kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his Fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that he little feared the judgments denounced against his Fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his own Estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous loss of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky Family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slain he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them without mercy, to the Sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident, by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry Which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did wast his Country, destroying all the Land of Nephthalim. Four and twenty years he reigned: and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his Son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the Son of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleat.

1 King. 15. 25.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his Father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gebbethon, the same Town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the Son of Jeroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilst, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious Man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he stiled himself King of Isral: and began his Reign with Massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not only to his Children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These news were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Soldiers instead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the Siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace: consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven days he is said to have Reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the Reign of seven days, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up a new head, who doubtless would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; only it appears that his side was decay'd, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindring the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

ANy Man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justly wonder how it came to pass, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present Civil Wars, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose, the one to endure a desperate necessity of yielding, or burning himself, the other to languish away, a Man forsaken: than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) unless it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deal in that business, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only bind his hands hands from attempting the ſuppreſſion of that preſent Inſurrection, it appears by the War continued between Iſrael and Juda, ſo many years following: wherein Abia ſo far prevailed, that he wan a great Battel, and recovered ſome Towns belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the ſecond cauſes, moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to ſuffer any thing under new upſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes upon that Royal Houſe of David, from which the ſucceſſion of five Kings in lineal deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors, in making Peace with Aſa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worſe than all that were before him, which as it might ſerve alone to prove, that Aſa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſſed to take at the very firſt, of revenging the Maſſacre committed upon the Family and Friends of Baaſha, (Aſa his mortal Enemy) gives manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more juſtly than he have expected the Friendſhip of Juda in that Quarrel. Wherefore, in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſs in the ten Tribes (which was ſuch that they may ſeem to have never thought upon the matter) to ſubmit themſelves to their true Princes; it were not amiſs to examine the cauſes, moving the People to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the Son of Jeroboam, who followed the Wars in Perſon, as a Man of Spirit and Courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very firſt defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane Reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heavy yoak of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their Necks. Their deſire was to have a King that ſhould not oppreſs them; not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediately chooſe Jeroboam in his ſtead, as a Man likely to afford that Liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it ſeems) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of Popularity appears in his building of decayed Towns, and in the inſtitution of his new deviſed Idolatry; where he told the People, that it was too much for them, to travel ſo far as to Jeruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his Reign, and in the Reign of his Son, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his Title, which at the firſt was only good by courteſie of the People: or whether the People (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome Prerogatives of a King that he ſtill retained in his own hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other Burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Iſrael joyned with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab; and eradication of Jeroboam's Houſe.

1 Kings 16. 25.

Now the Reign of Baaſha himſelf, was (for ought that remaineth in Writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that Buſineſs to his Son, who likewiſe appears an unprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needs be, that the favour of the People toward the Houſe of Baaſha grew from his good Form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And ſurely he that ſhall take pains to look into thoſe examples, which are extant of the different courſes, held by the Kings of Iſrael and Juda, in adminiſtration of Juſtice, will find it moſt probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo averſe from the Line of David; as to think all adverſity more tolerable than the weighty Scepter of that Houſe. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deſerved; yet in that they ſuffered it without form of Judgement, they ſuffered like unto Men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without Judgment, and without any Crime objected, other than the King's jealouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of Arbitrary Juſtice (under which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) he would have ſlain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any Offence, as appears by his confident return out of Ægypt, like one that was known to have endured wrong having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without Law, Jehoram did upon his Brethren, and upon ſundry of his greateſt Men; as alſo Joaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah the Son of Jehoiada, who had made him King, even in the Court of the Houſe of the Lord: and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent blood exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Jeruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſin wherewith he made Juda to ſin. Contrariwiſe, among the Kings of Iſrael we find no Monument of ſuch Arbitrary Proceeding, unleſs perhaps the words of Jehoram the Son of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inſtance, when he ſaid, God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if the Head of Eliſha the Son of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a falſe Prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own Children, which he thought a ſufficient Argument to prove, that it was not God's purpoſe to deliver them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the Liberty which the Iſraelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the King's Will. For Naboth did not fear to ſtand upon his own Right, though Ahab were even ſick for anger, neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as upon commandment, but made away by conſpiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give ſatisfaction to the People, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

2 Kings 21. 16.

2 King. 6. 31.

The murther of the Prophets is continually aſcribed to Jezebel, an impotent Woman, and not unto the King her Husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made, whereby their Lives were taken from them; but certain it is that the People, being Idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (ſuch as are Regiſtred) prove them to have uſed a more abſolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their ſufferings witneſs the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned over Juda, from the diviſion of the Kingdom, to the Captivity of the ten Tribes, three were ſlain by the People, and two were denied a place of Burial amongſt their Anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his Brethren, ſlain by Jehu, with the deſtruction of all the Royal Seed by Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) ſtir up in the People any ſuch thirſt of revenge, as might by the ſuddenneſs and uniformity teſtifie the affection to be general, and proceeding

proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes; unleſs we ſhould think that the death of Athalia, after ſeven Years Reign, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſenſe of her tyrannical abuſing the Government, whereon ſhe had ſeiſed. On the other ſide, ſuch of the Kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeven of the twenty) were all ſlain by conſpiracy of the great Men, who aſpired by Treaſon to the Crown: the People being ſo far from embruing their hands in the Blood of their Sovereigns that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power, nor approve the good ſucceſs of Treaſon, unleſs fear compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterouſly got and uſurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the ſeven remain, whoſe ends how the People took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is preciſely ſaid of the ſlaughter, committed on Ahab's Children by Jehu, that the People durſt not fight with him that did it, becauſe they were exceedingly afraid: and the ſame fear might be in them at the death of Peka, whoſe Hiſtory (as others of that time) is curſorily paſſed over. The like may be pronounced, and more abſolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them periſhed by fury of the people, but by Treaſon of ſuch as did ſucceed them, neither was there any motive urging ſo forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in Priſon, as fear leſt the people ſhould ſtir in their quarrel. And certainly (howſoever all that the Law calls Treaſon, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings deſtruction) in thoſe treaſonable inſurrections of the vulgar, which have here moſt prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it ſelf, with the Bloud of ſome great Officers; no ſuch Rebellions, howſoever wicked and barbarous otherwiſe, thirſting after the ruine of their natural Sovereign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal Perſon: which if any Man impute unto groſs ignorance, another may more charitably, and, I think, more truly, aſcribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briareus, who, being looſened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give aſſiſtance to Jupiter, when all the reſt of the Gods conſpired againſt him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as ſignifying, that Monarchs need not to fear any curbing of their Abſoluteneſs by mighty Subjects, as long as by Wiſdom they keep the Hearts of the People, who will be ſure to come in on their ſide. Though indeed the Story might very well have born the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the Conſpiracy, and that Thetis alone did mar all their Practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good Form of Government ſufficeth by it ſelf to retain the People, not only without aſſiſtance of a laborious Wit, but even againſt all Devices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt Politicians: every Sheriff and Conſtable, being ſooner able to arm the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than any over-weening Rebel how mighty ſoever, can againſt him.

2 Kings 10. 4.

This Declaration of the Peoples Love, being ſeldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the Rule it ſelf of Government there was ſuch, as neither gave occaſion of contentment unto the Subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which Reaſons it may ſeem that the multitude was kept uſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would have been almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the Siſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the Royal Blood of Juda, ſhould by the only Authority of a Queen Mother have deſtroyed all the Seed of David, and uſurped the Kingdom very near ſeven years without finding any reſiſtance. Yea when Jehoiada the high Prieſt had agreed with the Captains and principal Men of the Land to ſet up Joaſh their lawful King, whereunto the whole Nation were generally well affected; he was fain to give to theſe Captains and their Men, the Spears and the Shields that were King David's, and were in the houſe of the Lord. But we need not enter into ſuch particulars. Queſtionleſs, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admiſſion, holding the Crown by a more uncertain Tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the Reaſon, why the ten Tribes did never ſeek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſix firſt Kings, which died in the Reign of Aſa, admitted a ſeventh of a new Family, rather than they would conſubject themſelves, with thoſe of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy Yoak.

So, Aſa having ſeen the death of ſeven Kings of Iſrael, died himſelf after one and forty years Reign, leaving Jehoſhaphat his Son to deal with Ahab the Son of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

Of Jehoſhaphat and his Contemporaries.

Jehoſhaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a Prince Religious and happy, he deſtroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and ſent Searchers to all places and People wanting inſtruction, he recovered the Tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philiſtims: from the one he had Silver, from the other Sheep and Goats to the number of fifteen thouſand and four hundred. The numbers of his Men of War were more than admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the Command of three hundred thouſand, Jehohanan of two hundred and fourſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that he had, beſides theſe, in Benjamin of thoſe that bare Shields, which we call Targiiers, and of Archers under Eliada two hundred thouſand, and under the Commandment of Jehozabad a hundred and fourſcore thouſand: which numbred together, make eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand, all which are ſaid to have waited upon the King beſides his Garriſons. 2 Chron. 17.

That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, ſhould muſter eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand fighting Men, it is very ſtrange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourſcore thouſand: Abia four hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa five hundred and four ſcore thouſand: Amaziah inrolled all that could bear Arms, and they amounted to three hundred thouſand: Uzziah three hundred and ſeven thouſand and five hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when news 2 Sam. 14. 4.

was brought to Jehoshaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his Territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the Field eleven hundred and threescore thousand fighting Men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my self to better Judgment) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the seventeenth, distributed to several Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand under Adnah, and the two hundred and fourscore thousand under Jehohanan, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasia, Eliada, and Jehosabad: for the gross and total is not in that place set down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again as the Aids which Jehoshaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary Power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which he feared could never make the one half of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehoshaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince notwithstanding his greatness, yet he joyned in Friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked Woman Jezebel. Him Josaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his Son Joram to marry Athaliah, this Achab's Daughter.

Ahab perswaded Josaphat to assist him in the War against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretel the Success: who promised him Victory. But Jehoshaphat believed nothing at all in those Diviners, but resolved first of all to confer with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Achab made answer that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he always foretold of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet sent for Michaiah was to the King, but by the way the Messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise Victory unto them as they did. But Michaiah spake the Truth, and repeated his Vision to both Kings, which was that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a Spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false Spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ, Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kind did the Devil in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evil Spirits are the Ministers of God's Vengeance, and are used as the Hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save and deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evil that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to perform the Will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant Natures, but they are every where visible. There are Spirits, saith he, created for Vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they show forth their Power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his Revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose Spirit he discovered, was strucken by Zedekiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Achab himself committed to Prison: where he appointed him to be reserved and fed with Bread of affliction till he returned in Peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in Peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Achab went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned 2 Chron. 18.
with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumæans to invade Judæa: who pass Jordan, and encamp at Engaddi, and when Jehoshaphat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jahaziel foretold him of the Victory, which should be obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: and so when Jehoshaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumæans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves: those of Ammon and Moab set upon the Idumeans, and brake them utterly, which done, they also invaded each other; in which broil Jehoshaphat arriving took 2 Chron. 20.
the Spoil of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this Victory, Jehoshaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochazias the Son of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet foretold him, his Ships perished and were broken in the Port of Ezion Gaber, and so that Enterprize was 2 Chron. 20.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram the Brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel the Edomites joyn their Forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their Army.

The Moabites, Subjects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for Vassals to Jeroboam, and so they continued to his Successors till the death of Achab: but Josaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Collegue, yet as it seemeth, he was drawn into this War both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Josaphat, and thirdly to punish their double Rebellion who first forsook Juda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to pass by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to assure that Nation, for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the Field together at Engaddi against Jehoshaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehoshaphat, it is not certain, for in the 2 of Chronicles 11. Vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Jehoram, the Son of Josaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such Conditions as they required, offered to turn from them, and to joyn themselves with the Army of Juda. For that they were numbred among the Enemies of Josaphat it is plain in the 2 of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 2 v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoshaphat's death. Now in the passage of the Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumæans having a purpose to rebell, misled the Army of Juda and Israel with intent to infeeble them for want of Water; true it is, that they ſuffered the ſame, if not a greater thirſt than the Armies of Craſſus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian Expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, utterly periſhed, had not Eliſha taught them to cut Trenches whereinto the Water ſprang, by which not only Jehoſhaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Iſrael an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodneſs of God, having ever been prone to ſave the evil for the good, whereas he never deſtroyed the good for the evil.

The miſerable iſſue of this War, and how Moab burnt his Son, or the Son of the King of Edom for Sacrifice on the Rampire of his own City, I have 2 Chron. 20. already written in the Life of Jehoram among the Kings of Iſrael. Jehoſhaphat reigned twenty five Years and died, he was buried in the Valley of Jehoſhaphat, and a part of the Pyramis ſet over his Grave is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard. His Acts are written at large by Jehu the Son of Hanani. Broch. ter. ſanct.

There lived with Jehoſhaphat, Ophratenes in Aſſyria, Capetus and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the River Tiber (formerly Albula) took Name.

In Jehoſhaphat's time alſo ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Ageſilaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the ſame Race, of the Heraclida the ſeventh in Lacedamon. Badeſorus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Jehoram the Iſraelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the Son of Jehoſhaphat, and Ahazia.

§. I.

That Jehoram was made King ſundry times.

JEHORAM the Son of Jehoſhaphat King of Juda began to reign at thirty two years of Age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King: but of theſe eight years, which Jehoram is ſaid to have reigned four are to be reckoned in the Life of his Father, who going to the Syrian War with Ahab, 1 King. 22. verſ. 51. left this Jehoram King in his ſtead, as Ahab did his Son Ahazia. This appears by the ſeveral beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehorams Kings of Iſrael and Juda, and to Ahazia the eldeſt Son of Ahab. For Ahazia is ſaid to have begun his Reign, in the ſeventeenth year of Jehoſhaphat. Jehoram the Brother of Ahazia ſucceeded him in the ſecond year of Jehoram the Son 2 King. 1. 17. of Jehoſhaphat King of Juda, that is in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was deſigned King by his Father; it being (as we find elſewhere) the 2 King. 3. v. 1. & 9. eighteenth year of Jehoſhaphat himſelf, who went with the Iſraelite againſt Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the Royal Office was retained ſtill by Jehoſhaphat, who governed abſolutely by himſelf, not communicating the Rule with his Son. But in the fifth year of Jeho- 2 King. 8. 16. ram King of Iſrael, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoſhaphat, the old King took unto him, as Partner in the Government, this his eldeſt Son, who was at that time thirty two years old, his Father being fifty ſeven. Now foraſmuch as Je- 1 King. 22. 42. hoſhaphat reigned twenty five years, it is evident that his Son did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Iſrael. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Iſrael, who did not always reign preciſely ſo long as the bare Letter of the Text may ſeem at firſt to affirm: but their years were ſometimes compleat, ſometimes only current, ſometimes confounded with the years of their Succeſſors or Foregoers, and muſt therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of thoſe others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leſs needful than curious, to enquire into the Reaſons moving Jehoſhaphat either to aſſume unto him his Son as Partner in the Kingdom, whilſt he was able himſelf to command both in Peace and in War, the like having never been done by any of his Progenitors, or having once (in the ſeventeenth of his Reign) vouchſafed unto him that honour, to reſume it unto himſelf, or at leaſt-wiſe to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were paſſed. Yet foraſmuch as to enter into the examination of theſe Paſſages, may be a mean to find ſome light, whereby we may more clearly diſcover the cauſes of much extraordinary Buſineſs enſuing, I hold it not amiſs to make ſuch Conjecture, as the Circumſtances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may ſeem to approve.

We are therefore to conſider; that this King Jehoſhaphat was the firſt of Rehoboam's iſſue that ever entred into any ſtreight League with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much Labour and long War, tired themſelves in vain, making ſmall Profit of the greateſt Advantages that could be wiſhed. Wherefore Jehoſhaphat thought it the wiſeſt way, to make a League offenſive and defenſive between Iſrael and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This Confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord; could not long 2 Chron. 19. 2, & 3. proſper, as not iſſuing from the true Root and Fountain of all Wiſdom: yet as a piece of ſound Policy, doubtleſs it wanted not fair Pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutual fortification of both thoſe Kingdoms, againſt the uncircumciſed Nations their ancient Enemies. This apparent Benefit, being ſo ineſtimable a Jewel that it might not eaſily be loſt, but continue as Hereditary from Father to Son, it was thought a very good courſe to have it confirmed by ſome ſure Bond of Affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the Daughter of Omri and Siſter of Ahab King of Iſrael, given in Marriage to Jehoram, who was Son and Heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a maſculine Spirit, and had learned ſo much of Queen Jezabel her Brothers Wife, that ſhe durſt undertake, and could throughly perform a great deal more in Jeruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſs in Samaria. She was indeed a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those Men or their Children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first-fruits of this great League, was the Syrian War at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldom thrive by matching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turns of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed, as King, his Son Ahazia; not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of War (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michaia (for he despised them) as inviting Jehoshaphat by his own example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoshaphat to change his purpose often, in making his Son Jehoram King.

MAny arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his Wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab.

That she was a Woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vain matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his Children, which were begotten upon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not upon base Women and meer Subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent Man think highly of himself, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soon his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his Idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that some smoak, out of the hidden fire, did very soon make his Fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young Man to know himself better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Jehoshaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole Country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly Son. For the good old King was fain to make his progress round about the land, reclaiming the people unto the service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda City by City. This had been a needless labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himself, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Justice been perverted by the power of such as had born authority. But the necessity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, and to the steward of his house in temporal matters, to be general overseers.

2 Chron. 19. v. 4, 5, &c.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the Son of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahazia began his raign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram Jehoshaphat's Son, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second year, even in his Fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So he continued in private estate, until the two and twentieth of his Fathers raign, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto, appearing substantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondency with Jehoshaphat, that his Father had done; and made use of it. He drew the Judæan into the War of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his Father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger Sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himself, might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing usual in mischievous fell Natures, to be as abject and servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise towards his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not only with store of Silver, and of Gold, and of pretious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtless had used unto their younger Sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils.

2 Chron. 21. 3.

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he raigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequel. When once the good old Man, their Father, was dead, the younger Sons of Jehoshaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the Summons of the King their brother, then had he them without more ado; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdom against them, so that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great Men of the Land; such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things, derogatory to their young Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in religion; wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe-conduct unto superstition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sin, whereto it is wonderful that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sins; but he used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up irreligion by force.

Whilst he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto, since David's time, been governed by a Viceroy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flie into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those, whom he should have subdued, and kept his Servants. Now began the Prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Esau in procels of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civil and foreign Wars, the Jews by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The Freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Josuah had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerful, cruel, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither do we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new Subjection, but continued a free Estate.

2 Chron. 21. 10. The Rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: For it was a Town of the Levites: who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrary to God's law, had not only some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which being devout Men they might fear to lose by this Rebellion) it was never denyed to those of the ten revolted Tribes by any of the religious Kings,

2 Chron. 30. who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than to suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general visitation before remembred, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his Kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especial charge to do justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shall be Officers before you; Be of Good courage and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than just proceedings of his Son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might in one Month have cast into it with shovels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seems that of these great numbers which his Father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier loss, to let one Town go, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared, than to be loved; are fain themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a prophecy in writing was delivered unto him, which threatned both his people, his Children, his Wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel Persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and evil Kings, but were fain to denounce Gods judgments against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the days of Jehosephat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecy in writing, behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from Heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from Heaven to St. Giles.

2 Chron. 21. 12.

2 Kings c. 2. & c. 3. v. 11.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecy was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judaa, and took the Kings House, Houſe, wherein they found all, or many of his Children, and Wives, all which they ſlew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. Theſe Philiſtims had not preſumed ſince the time of David, to make any offenſive War till now; for they were by him almoſt conſumed, and had loſt the beſt of their Towns, maintaining themſelves in the reſt of their ſmall Territory, by defenſive arms, to which they were conſtrained at Gibbethon by the Iſraelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then as they are now, a naked people, all Horſemen, and ill appointed; their Country affording no other furniture, than ſuch as might make them fitter to rob and ſpoil in the open fields, than to offend ſtrong Cities ſuch as were thick ſet in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the World then known, in a very ſhort ſpace of time, deſtroying ſome, and building other ſome very ſtately Cities. But it muſt be conſidered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the art of War; and that the proviſions which they found, together with the arts which they learned, in one ſubdued Province, did make them able and skilful in purſuing their conqueſt, and going onward into Regions far removed from them. At this day having loſt in effect all that they had gotten, ſuch of them as live in Arabia it ſelf are good Horſemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to paſſengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding ſtark naked, and rather truſting in the ſwiftneſs of their horſes, than in any other means of reſiſtance, where they are well oppoſed. And ſuch, or little better, may they ſeem to have been, that ſpoiled Judæa in the time of Jehoram. For their Country was always barren and Deſart, wanting manual arts whereby to ſupply the naturals with furniture: neither are theſe bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philiſtims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the leaſt muſter of Juda and Benjamin under Jehoſaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thouſand fighting Men) had been enough to have driven away far greater forces than theſe enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealouſie, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philiſtims.

It may ſeem that the houſe of the King which theſe invaders took, was not his Palace in Jeruſalem, but rather ſome other houſe of his abroad in the Country, where his Wives and Children at that time lay for their recreation: becauſe we read not that they did ſack the City, or ſpoil the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they got poſſeſſion thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jeruſalem it ſelf by ſurpriſe, the people being diſarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, becauſe it was ſo large and populous; and therefore having done what ſpoil they could, withdrew themſelves with ſuch purchace as they were able ſafely to convey away.

The ſlaughter committed by Jehu upon the two and forty brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elſewhere) ſo many of his Brothers Sons, and the cruel maſſacre wherein all the Royal ſeed periſhed (only Joas excepted) under the tyranny of Athalia following within two years after this invaſion of the Philiſtims, and Arabians, make it ſeem probable, that the Sons of Jehoram were not all ſlain at once, but that rather the firſt murther began in his own time, and was ſeconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith his houſe was inceſſantly ſtricken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After theſe calamities, the hand of God was extended againſt the body of this wicked King, ſmiting him with a grievous diſeaſe in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched Soul departed from his miſerable carcaſs. The people of the Land, as they had ſmall cauſe of comfort in his life, ſo had they not the good manners to pretend ſorrow for his death; wherefore he was denyed a place of burial among his Anceſtors the Kings of Juda, though his own Son ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the ſame Spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead huſband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatneſs, to retain her favorites in their authority, and to place about her Son ſuch Counſellers, of the houſe of Ahab, as were fitteſt for her turn. Wherefore ſhe thought it unſeaſonable to make much a-do about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a ſtately funeral of a Man by them deteſted: but rather choſe to let the blame of things paſſed be laid upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her ſelf, and hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked inſtigators, having made greedy uſe of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults alſo, the Man whoſe evil inclinations their miniſter counſels have made worſe, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a buſy time; when his friend and Coſin the Iſraelite, who had the ſame name, was entangled in a difficult War againſt the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leiſure to help Athalia in ſetting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the ſame hindrance) to help her husband, when he was diſtreſſed by the Philiſtims. Yea rather he needed and craved the aſſiſtance of the Men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not ſped ſo well the laſt time, that they ſhould willingly run thither again, unleſs they were very fairly intreated. 2 Chron. 22. 4.

The acts of this wicked Man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (purſuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumſtances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accompliſh nevertheleſs his hidden purpoſe, and without miraculous means, confound themſelves in the ſeeming-wiſe devices of their own folly: as likewiſe to the end that all men might learn, to ſubmit their judgments to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may ſafely diſpenſe with his commandments, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wiſdom dictateth unto them. For in ſuch kind of unhappy ſubtilties, it is manifeſt that Athalia was able to furniſh both her Husband and her Son, but the Iſſue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the raign of Ahazia, and his busines with the King of Israel.

OChazias, or Ahazia, the Son of Jehoram and Athalia, began his raign over Juda in the twelfth year of Jehoram, the Son of Ahab King of Israel, and raigned but that one year. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficulty than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Tornellus, alledging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his Kingdom, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsel by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise upheld the League made with the House of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his Cosen the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blows: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own person, which scaped not unwounded. The Town being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Israel withdrew himself to the City of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he raigned in all scantly one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindred, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of Work so to leave his Kingdom, having no other business than by way of complement to go to see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgment, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet, upon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidental; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtless was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needful for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Army of Israel, with all the principal Captains lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Jehu, a principal Man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the propnecy of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know his errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had overheard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the prophecy of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu who had upon the suddain this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections who joyned with him, in setting on foot the business which nearly concerned him, and was not to be foreslowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Izreel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royal there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the Son of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loss of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of success, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an unlikely tale, by them that beheld the majestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this security, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells and enemies; or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already well atchieved, and the Queen-Mother dressing her self in the bravest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company coming. These news were not very troublesome: for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stir. Only the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another, that ſhould bring him word how all went; and he was likewiſe detained by Jehu. Theſe dumb ſhows bred ſome ſuſpicion in Jehoram, whom the Watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the compay drew ſo near that they might, though not perfectly, be diſcerned, and notice taken of Jehu himſelf by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to diſcover any weakneſs, cauſed his Chariot to be made ready, and iſſued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his company, whoſe preſence added Majeſty to his Train, when ſtrength to reſiſt, or expedition to flee had been more needful. This could not be done ſo haſtily, but that Jehu was come even to the Towns end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to ſalute Jehu with terms of Peace, but receiving a bitter anſwer, his heart failed him, ſo that crying out upon the Treaſon to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu ſoon overtook him with an Arrow, wherewith he ſtrook him dead, and threw his carcaſs into that field, which, purchaſed with the blood of the rightful owner, was to be watered with blood of the unjuſt poſſeſſour. Neither did Ahazia eſcape ſo well, but that he was arreſted by a wound, which held him till death did ſeize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the Wall, by the gate of the City, where Jezebel might ſoon be advertiſed of this calamity, if ſhe did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whoſe judgment, pronounced againſt her long before, had overtaken her, when ſhe leaſt expected it. But ſhe, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her ſelf ready in all haſt, and painted her face, hoping with her ſtately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitour, or at the leaſt to utter ſome Apophthegm, that ſhould expreſs her brave ſpirit, and brand him with ſuch a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did ſhe think upon the hungry Dogs, that were ordained to devour her, whoſe paunches the ſtibium, with which ſhe beſmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the ſcolding language wherewith ſhe armed her tongue, could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew near ſhe opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long injoyed the fruits of his Treaſon, and murther of the King his Maſter. This was in meer humane valuation ſtoutly ſpoken, but was indeed a part of miſerable folly, as are all things, howſoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that ſtood by and heard her, were not affected ſo much as with any compaſſion of her fortune; much leſs was her enemy daunted with her proud ſpirit. When Jehu ſaw that ſhe did uſe the little remainder of her life in ſeeking to vex him; he made her preſently to underſtand her own eſtate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her Servants to know which of them would be of his ſide, and ſoon found them ready to offer their ſervice, before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to caſt her down head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatneſs and eſtate, wherein ſhe had a few hours before ſhined ſo gloriouſly in the eys of Men; of Men that conſidered not the judgments of God that had been denounced againſt her.

So periſhed this accurſed Woman by the rude hands of her own Servants, at the commandment of her greateſt Enemy, that was yeſterday her Subject, but now her Lord: and ſhe periſhed miſerably ſtrugling in vain with baſe Grooms, who contumelioufly did hale and thruſt her, whilſt her inſulting Enemy ſate on Horſe-back, adding indignity to her grief by ſcornfully beholding the ſhameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcaſs that was left without the Walls was devoured by Doggs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, Murther, and oppreſſion, with ſlow, but ſure payment, and full intereſt.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where he lurked, and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdom of Samaria, was ſuffered to get him gone (which he did in all haſt) and ſeek his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grand-fathers ſake, not for his Fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jeruſalem, where he was interred with his Anceſtors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whoſe Son he was that ſuceeded unto her.

§. I.

Of Athalia her uſurping the Kingdom, and what pretences ſhe might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 9.

After the death of Ahazia, it is ſaid that his houſe was not able to retain the Kingdom: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her Son, have given occaſion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas who reigned ſhortly after. For Athalia being thus diſpoiled of her Son, under whoſe name ſhe had ruled at her pleaſure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and ſlew them, that ſo ſhe might occupy the Royal Throne her ſelf, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before hand put into great place, and made Counſellors unto her Son, ſuch as were fitteſt for her purpoſe, and ready at all times to excute her will: that ſhe kept a ſtrong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to ſtir, whatſoever they ſaw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent ſoever it be, is ſeldom or never ſo ſhameleſs as to refuſe the commodity of goodly pretences offering themſelves; but rather ſcrapes together all that will any way ſerve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia when she saw the Princes of the Royal blood, all of them in a manner, slain by her Husband, and afterwards his own Children destroyed by the Philistims, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelyhoods, those possibilities wherewith her Husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some trusty creature of hers, might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the Issue of David, which now remained only in his Family, should by any accident fail (as woful experience had already shewed what might after come to pass) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious Man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthiness, would not care what aspersions he laid upon that Royal house, which was fallen down. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authority, not only his Successor, but also the reversioner, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to any rifeling, but remain in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared coming to pass, his own posterity could not retain it.

Such perswasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate solicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think that the only way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heir to the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to up-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her Husbands times, yet might she do it in her Sons. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the security of his half-brethren, or their Children; as accounting his Fathers other Wives, in respect of his own high Born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their Children basely begotten. But if this mischievous Woman forgat her self so far in her wicked policy, that she lost all opportunity which the weakness of her Husband and Son did afford, of procuring to her self some seeming Title; yet could she afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly she might: being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certainty of her Son or Husband in another world. But I rather think that she took order for her affairs before hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her Son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her Husbands issue by other Women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephews of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the Children of the King, and the Children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the quality of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious that their entertainment in Jezabels house would only have been more formal, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no less. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validity than the Sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold this is new? it hath been already in the old time that was before us. Eccles. 1. 10. That a King might shed his Brothers blood, was proved by Salomon upon Adonija; that he might aliene the Crown from his natural Heirs, David had given proof: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why. Salomon slew his Brother that had begun one Rebellion, and was entring into another. Jehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the Kingdom, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Ahazia sought to cut off the Succession of his Brethren, or of their Issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehoiada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash, Behold the Kings Son must reign, as the Lord hath said of the Sons of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it six whole years, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming-security. 2 Chro. 21. ver. 13.

§. II.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never go about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in Wars against the Aramite, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventy living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by Letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one days warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyned by a second Letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great Sacrifice to their God, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the Monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the poſſeſſion of a cruel Tyranneſs: he had received his Kingdom by the unexpected Grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeal expreſſed in deſtroying Baal out of Iſrael, he was promiſed, notwithſtanding his following the ſin of Jeroboam, that the Kingdom ſhould remain in his Family, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not ſerve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumſpection; doing therein like a fooliſh greedy Gameſter, who by ſtealing a needleſs Card to aſſure himſelf of winning a ſtake, forfeits his whole reſt. He had queſtionleſs diſpleaſed many, by that which he did againſt Baal; and many more he ſhould offend by taking from them the uſe of a ſuperſtition, ſo long practiſed as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all theſe, how many ſoever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom, to retain them, he now forſook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Iſrael, whereof Hazael King of Damaſcus, was the Executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the prophecy of Elizæus, who fore-told it, ſaying: Their ſtrong Cities ſhalt thou ſet on fire, and their young Men ſhalt thou ſlay with the Sword, and ſhalt daſh their Infants againſt the Stones, and rent in pieces their Women with Child. So did not only the wickedneſs of Ahab cauſe the ruine of his whole houſe, but the obſtinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable miſery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazael's victory was not quenched with the deſtruction of a few Towns, nor wearied with one invaſion; but he ſmote them in all the coaſts of Iſrael, and waſted all the Country beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithſtanding all theſe calamities it ſeems that the people repented not of their Idolatry; (For in thoſe days the Lord began to loath Iſrael,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the Noble Houſe of Ahab, under which they had beaten thoſe enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the Conqueſt of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to reſtore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful ſhifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Maſter that had put him in truſt, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in ſerving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are inſtead of the eaſe, and pleaſure to themſelves propounded by contrary courſes, over-whelmed with the troubles which they ſought to avoid, and therein by God whom they firſt forſook, forſaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wiſdom, wherein they had repoſed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athalia's Government.

THeſe calamities falling upon Iſrael, kept Athalia ſafe on that ſide, giving her leiſure to look to things at home; as having little to do abroad, unleſs it were ſo that ſhe held ſome correſpondency with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grand-father King Aſa, who had done the like. And ſome probability that ſhe did ſo may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find that this wicked Athalia and her Children brake up the houſe of God, and all things that were dedicate for the houſe of the Lord did they beſtow upon Baalim. Such a ſacriledge, though it proceeded from a deſire to ſet out her own Idolatry, with ſuch pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples Eyes, was not likely to want ſome fair pretext of neceſſity of the State ſo requiring: in which caſe others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next ſucceſſour was fain to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taſt of that which was formerly thence extracted for his ſake.

2 Chron. 24. v. 7.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Prieſts and Levites was very notable, and ſerved (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himſelf, howſoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that ſacred Tribe of Levi, muſt needs have been exceeding great at this time; all their Lands and poſſeſſions in the ten Tribes being utterly loſt, the oblations and other perquiſites, by which they lived, being now very few, and ſmall; and the ſtore laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhameful robbery. Yet they upheld in all this miſery the ſervice of God, and the daily Sacrifice, keeping duly their courſes, and performing obedience to the High Prieſt, no leſs than in thoſe days wherein their entertainment was far better.

§. IV.

Of the preſervation of Joas.

JEhoiada then occupied the High Prieſt-hood, an honourable, wiſe and religious Man. To his carefulneſs it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort upheld in thoſe unhappy times. His Wife was Jehoſhabeth, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and Siſter to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whoſe piety makes it ſeem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her acceſs to the Court argue the contrary: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her own Fathers houſe, than the education under ſuch a Mother could have permitted her to be ſuch as ſhe was. By her care Joaſh the young Prince that reigned ſoon after, was conveighed out of the nurſery, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings Children, and was carried ſecretly into the Temple, where as ſecretly he was brought up. How it came to paſs that this young Child was not hunted out, when his body was miſſing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people ſhould hear ſay, that one of the Children had avoided that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and ſo be the leſs conformable to the preſent Government. So Joaſh was delivered out of that ſlaughter, he and his Nurſe being gone no Man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be caſt away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him ſuck, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe her ſelf ſhould have been ſlain, was fled fled away with him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or Men desirous of reward, easily coyn such tales, and rather fear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

§. V.

Whose Son Joas was.

†. I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Ahazia.

2 King. 11. 2. & 2 Chron. 22. v. 11. NOW concerning this Joash, whose Son he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath caused much controversie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the Son of Ahazia, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give that title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties, appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural Son of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retain the Kingdom; 2 Chron. 22. v. 9. some do infer that this Joash was not properly called his Son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a Son in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For she perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom she had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the tyranny exercised by her Husband, at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruin of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own Grand-child had been Heir to the Crown; for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and less envy, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and secure of her own Estate, as not wanting an Heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use, than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grandmothers to their Nephews, is little less than that of Mothers to their Children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all natural affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

†. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUt (as it is more easie to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the Pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the Son of Ahazia, set down in such sort that it may very justly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the Son of David, and not from Salomon; to which purpose they bring a History (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, saying that the line of Salomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan should succeed it. Concering this Nathan the Son of David there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustin sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the Sons of David, by Bathshua the Daughter of Ammiel, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, have likewise held the same of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have been the Children of Uria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his Mother, do approve this exposition: for we read of no more than two Sons which Bathshua or Bathsheba did bear unto David; whereof the one, begotten in Adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon only of her Children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have been the Children of Uria, and are thought to have been David's only by adoption. Wherefore, if Joas had not been the Son of Ahazia, then must that Pedigree have been false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the Loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only been of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and form of Law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other Edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speak what he list. 1 Chro. 3. 5.

†. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the Son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtful a case, if it seem lawful to hold an opinion that no Man hath yet thought upon, methinks it were not amiss to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the Son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his Children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his Children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a Son left him save Jehoahas the youngest 2 King. 8. v. 19.

of his Sons. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promiſe to David, that, after thoſe Maſſacres of Jehoram, upon all his Brethren, and of the Philiſtims, and Arabians upon the Children of Jehoram, one of the ſeed of David eſcaped; why may it not be thought that he was ſaid to have eſcaped, in whom the line of David was preſerved? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted up in theſe woful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof; like enough it is that ſome remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event ſo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguiſhed, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogy of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke but the preſervation of the houſe of David, mentioned in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perſon of Jehoahas in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legal iſſue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joaſh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngeſt Son of Jehoram, whoſe life Athalia, as a Stepdame, was not unlikely to purſue. For it were not eaſily underſtood, why the preſervation of David's line, by Gods eſpecial mercy in regard of his promiſe made, ſhould pertain rather to that time, when beſides Ahazia himſelf there were two and forty of his Brethren, or (as in another place they are called) Sons of his Brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all ſlain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable deſtruction and little leſs than extirpation of that Progeny, wherein one only did eſcape. Certainly that inhumane murther which Jehoram committed upon his Brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Hiſtory) revenged upon his own Children; then was not this vengeance of God accompliſhed by the Philiſtims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards proſecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that ſame wicked Woman, at whoſe inſtigation he had committed ſuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon Jehoram and all his Children, only Jehoahas, his youngeſt Son was exempted; whom therefore if I ſhould affirm to be the ſame with Joas, which is called the Son of Ahazia, I ſhould not want good probability. Some further appearance of neceſſity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwiſe have been. For it was the youngeſt Son of Jehoram in whom the race was preſerved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, ſeeing that he was twenty years old at the leaſt (as is already noted) when he began to Reign, and conſequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers Age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram ſhould have begotten many Children before he was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many Wives and Children, he ſhould upon the ſuddain, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which muſt have been true, if this were true that Ahazia was the ſame Jehoahas, which was his youngeſt Son. But this inconvenience is taken away, and thoſe other doubts ariſing from the cauſleſs cruelty of Athalia, in ſeeking the life of Joas, are eaſily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withſtand this opinion. for he was ſeven years old when he began to Reign; which if we underſtand of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten ſomewhat after the beginning of his ſickneſs. Neither is it more abſurd to ſay that he was the natural Son of Jehoram, though called the Son of Ahazia, than it were to ſay, as great Authors have done, this difficulty notwithſtanding, that he was of the Poſterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to anſwer; which, had it concurred with the reſt, might have ſerved as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that ſoundeth much more near to Joas, than to Ahazia, in an Engliſh ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by ſome, skilful in that Language) through the diverſity of certain Letters, differ much from that which it moſt reſembleth in our Weſtern manner of Writing, and little from the other. Now although it be ſo that Ahazia himſelf be alſo called Azaria, and muſt have had three names, if he were the ſame with Jehoahas; in which manner Joas might alſo have had ſeveral names; yet becauſe I find no other warrant hereof than a bare poſſibility, I will not preſume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the conſideration of ſuch as have more ability to judge, and leiſure to conſider of this point.

Upon what reaſons Athalia might ſeek to deſtroy Joas, if he were her own Grand-child.

IF therefore we ſhall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the Text according to the letter, it may be ſaid that Athalia was not only blinded by the paſſions of ambition and zeal to her Idolatrous worſhip of Baalim, but purſued the accompliſhment of ſome natural deſires, in ſeeking the deſtruction of her Grandchild, and the reſt of the blood Royal. For whether it were ſo that Athalia (as proud and cruel Women are not always chaſt) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her Siſter-in-Law, whoſe Whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her Son; or whether ſhe had Children by ſome former Husband, before ſhe was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely in regard of her age, who was Daughter of Omri, and Siſter to Ahab) certain it is that ſhe had Sons of her own, and thoſe old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to ſettle the Crown upon her own Children, ſhe did ſeek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joas, if ſhe were his Grand-mother, yet ſhe might miſtruſt the intereſt which his Mother would have in him, leſt when he came to years, it might withdraw him from her devotion. And hereof (beſides that Women do commonly better love their Daughters Husbands, than their Sons Wives) there is ſome appearance in the Reign of her Son: for ſhe made him ſpend all his time in idle journies, to no other apparent end, than that ſhe might rule at home; and he living abroad, be eſtranged from his Wife, and entertain ſome new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his tutoreſs. But when the Sword of Jehu had rudely cut in ſunder all theſe fine devices, then was Athalia fain to go roundly to work, and do as ſhe did, whereby ſhe thought to make all ſure. Otherwiſe, if (as I could rather think) ſhe were only Stepdame to Joas, we need not ſeek into the reaſons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cauſe enough to diſpatch him among the firſt.

§. VI.

VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of using Conjecture in Histories.

THUS much concerning the Person of Joas, from whom, as from a new Root, the Tree of David was propagated into many Branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diversity between it and others, the less, methinks, I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldness in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories do give us information of human counsels and events, as far forth as the knowledge and Faith of the Writers can afford; but of Gods Will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only at random, and many times falsly. This we often find in Prophane Writers, who ascribe the ill success of great undertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the less wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jews in Ægypt unto Jeremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For, howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the People, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their own wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of Heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to do; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off the service of that Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisdom of Man, in looking into the Counsel of God, which to find out there is no better nor other guide than his own written Will, not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. c. 44. v. 17, & 18.

But this History of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular Prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of meerly human Authors: it setteth down expresly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardness in Battel; the ruin of his Family, to the security of Jeroboam in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming in of Jehu; but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean, to his revealed Will: from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman Sir Philip Sidny, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, Records not always true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions, which did set them first on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed: for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his journy against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another business, or any practice of that kind, is neither Historical nor Poetical) to search into the particular humours of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they do collect the most likely motives, or impediments of every business; and so figuring, as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsel, or obliquity in proceeding.

S. Phil. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of Man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many Eyes which pry both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own close temper, or by some subtil mist, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industry of an Historian, having so many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that seem far greater. So comes it many times to pass, that great Fires, which consume whole Houses or Towns, begin with a few Straws, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastned upon some Wood pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionless it is that the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrel: yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian Dames her bondwomen, did first move Darius to prepare for this War, before he had received any injury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

Herod. l. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her Husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm, (having I think, in every estate some sufficient witnesses) that matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certain Frier, coming to visit him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his Familiar Friend. This poor Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of Speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holiness, whom he rather took for a direct honest Man, than any cunning Politician, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty Brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptness thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Frier, dealt with him again as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this World is governed, thou wouldst wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant Engines, by which the course of affairs is moved; the Pope said true. For the wisest of Men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, earneſtly, than right reaſon either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that ſupreme Governour, of whoſe Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was ſaid of Jupiter.

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventoſum, & urbes, regnaque triſtia,
Divoſque, mortaleſque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller Earth, the wind-ſwoln Streams,
The civil Cities, and th'infernal Realms,
Who th'hoſt of Heaven and the mortal Band,
Alone doth govern by his juſt command.

Then ſhall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; he foreſeeth all things, and all things diſpoſeth to his own honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the ſame for ever, doth conſtantly govern all Creatures by that Law, which he hath preſcribed and will never alter. The vanities of Men beguile their vain contrivers, and the proſperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their deſtruction: yea, this broad and headlong paſſage to Hell, is not ſo delightful as it ſeemeth at the firſt entrance, but hath growing in it, beſides the Poyſons which infect the Soul, many cruel Thorns deeply wounding the Body, all which, if any few eſcape, they have only this miſerable advantage of others, that their deſcent was the more ſwift and expedite. But the ſervice of God is the Path guiding us to perfect happineſs, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yielding ſuch abundance of joy to the Conſcience, as doth eaſily countervail all afflictions whatſoever: though indeed thoſe Brambles that ſometimes tear the Skin of ſuch as walk in this bleſſed way, do commonly lay hold upon them at ſuch time as they ſit down to take their eaſe, and make them wiſh themſelves at their journies end, in preſence of their Lord whom they faithfully ſerve, in whoſe preſence is the fulneſs of joy, and at whoſe right hand are pleaſures for evermore.

Pſal. 16. v. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and ſcope of all Hiſtory, to teach by example of times paſt, ſuch wiſdom as may guide our deſires and actions, we ſhould not marvail though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael, being written by Men inſpired with the Spirit of God, inſtruct us chiefly, in that which is moſt requiſite for us to know, as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illuſtrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wiſdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by ſome Prophet after the Captivity: we may well believe that the Counſel of God therein, and the execution of his Righteous Will, ſhould have occupied either the whole, or the principal room in that Narration. Yet had not the purpoſe of Darius, the deſire of his life, and the buſineſs at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the leſs true, though they might have been omitted, as the leſs material: but theſe things it had been lawful for any Man to gather out of Prophane Hiſtories, or out of circumſtances otherwiſe appearing, wherein he ſhould not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the firſt cauſes, by aſcribing to the ſecond more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the buſineſs that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any Man of judgment will tax me as either fabulous or preſumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearſeth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that ſeeketh to illuſtrate and make good in humane reaſon, thoſe things, which Authority alone, without further circumſtance, ought to have confirmed in every Man's belief. And this may ſuffice in defence of the liberty, which I have uſed in conjectures, and may hereafter uſe when occaſion ſhall require, as neither unlawful, nor misbeſeeming an Hiſtorian.

The Conſpiracy againſt Athalia.

WHEN Athalia had now ſix years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found neither any Foreign Enemy, nor Domeſtical Adverſary to diſturb her poſſeſſion, ſuddainly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickedneſs meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and ſhameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be ſuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his Education ſhould be ſimple, to make him ſeem the Child of ſome poor Man (as for his ſafety it was requiſite,) when his capacity required to have been indued with the ſtomach and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehoiada the Prieſt conſidered, and withall the great increaſe of impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to ſpread it ſelf over all the Country, if care were not uſed to weed it up very ſpeedily. Wherefore he aſſociated to himſelf five of the Captains, in whoſe fidelity he had beſt aſſurance, and having taken an Oath of them, and ſhewed them the King's Son, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. Theſe drew in others of the principal Men, to countenance the action, procuring at the firſt only, that they ſhould repair to Jeruſalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perſwaſions to win them to the buſineſs: the Promiſe of the Lord unto the Houſe of David was enough to aſſure them, that the action was both lawful, and likely to ſucceed as they deſired.

But in compaſſing their intent ſome difficulties appeared. For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they ſhould bring their purpoſe to good iſſue; neither were the Captains, and other aſſociates of Jehoiada able by cloſe working, to draw together ſo many truſty and ſerviceable hands as would ſuffice to manage the buſineſs. To help in this caſe, the Prieſt gave order to ſuch of the Levites, as had finiſhed their courſes in waiting on the Divine Service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that ſucceeded in their turns, that they ſhould not depart until they knew his further pleaſure. So by admitting the new comers, and not diſcharging the old, he had, without any noiſe, made up ſuch a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough, for if the Tyranneſs did not prevail againſt them at the firſt brunt, the favour of the People was like to ſhew it ſelf on their ſide, who made head againſt her. Theſe Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the Perſon of the King, who as yet was kept cloſe; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents were beſtowed in the utter Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it ſelf had ſtore enough; King

David

All things being in readineſs, and the day come wherein this high deſign was to be put in execution; Jehoiada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard unto the Kings perſon; produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; uſing all ceremonies accuſtomed in ſuch ſolemnities, with great applauſe of the people. Of theſe doings the Queen was the laſt that heard any word; which is not ſo ſtrange as it may ſeem: for inſolent natures, by dealing outragiouſly with ſuch as bring them ill tidings, do commonly loſe the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilſt yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the ſuddenneſs, behold it in the ſhape of inevitable miſchief.

All Jeruſalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to ſee, and the common joy was ſo great, that without apprehenſion of peril, under the Windows of the Court; were the people running and praiſing the King.
2 Chro. 23. 12. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourſe, and noiſe, of folks in the Streets, making towards the Temple, with much unuſual paſſion in their looks, did preſently conceive, that ſomewhat worthy of her care was happened; though what it might be ſhe did not apprehend. Howſoever it were, ſhe meant to uſe her own wiſdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occaſion might happen to require. It may be, that ſhe thought it ſome eſpecial ſolemnity uſed in the Divine Service, which cauſed this much ado; and hereof the unaccuſtomed number of Levites, and of other devout Men, about the Town, might give ſome preſumption.

Many things argue that ſhe little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Joſephus would make it ſeem otherwiſe. For we find in the Text,
2 Chro. 23. 12, & 13, & 2 Kin. c. 11. ver. 13. & 14. She came to the people in the houſe of the Lord (which was near to her Palace) and that when ſhe looked and ſaw the King ſtand by his Pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great Men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, ſhe rent her Clothes, and cryed, Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appears that ſhe was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or fear, to take her place, which when ſhe found occupied by another, then ſhe began to afflict her ſelf, as one caſt away, and cryed out in vain upon the Treaſon, whereby ſhe ſaw that ſhe muſt periſh. But that ſhe came with a Guard of armed Men to the Temple, (as Joſephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, ſhe entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had ſhe truly known how things went, ſhe would ſurely have gathered her friends about her, and uſed thoſe forces in defence of her Crown, by which ſhe gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly if it were granted, that ſhe, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her Troop, yet it had been meer madneſs in her, to enter the place alone, when her aſſiſtants were kept out; but if ſhe perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own Weapons, could prevail to let in her Guard, would neverthleſs take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of ſeven years old a Conſpirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ſhe ſaw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that ſhe was mad in the moſt extreme degree? Certain it is that the Counſel of God would have taken effect, in her deſtruction, had ſhe uſed the moſt likely means to diſappoint it: yet we need not ſo cut her throat with any moral impoſſibilities. It is enough to ſay, that the godly zeal of Jehoiada found more eaſie ſucceſs, through her indiſcretion, than otherwiſe could have been expected; ſo that at his appointment ſhe was without more ado carried out of the Temple and ſlain, yea ſo, that no blood ſave her own was ſhed in that quarrel; her ſmall train, that ſhe brought along with her, not daring to ſtand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a compariſon of her and Jezabel.

MOſt likely it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the raſhneſs of her Nephew Jehoram the Iſraelite, who did fooliſhly caſt himſelf into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, only through his eager deſire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet ſhe her ſelf, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived ſuch a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a ſutable death. Theſe two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband; was an Idolatreſs, and a Murdreſs. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them ſurviving her Huſband about eight years, did ſpend the time in ſatisfying her own affections; the one uſing Tyranny, as the exerciſe of her haughty mind; the other paining her face, for the ornament of her unchaſt body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in thoſe things which may ſeem in this World to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the ſuddain by Conſpirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treaſon, received ſentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her ſubjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies Horſes; Athalia ſlain at her own Horſe-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leiſure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel, the more indignity, and ſhame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Doggs, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that ſhe was buried, as having not perſecuted and ſlain the Lords Prophets, but ſuffered the Prieſts to exerciſe their function; yet of her burial there is no Monument; for ſhe was a Church-robber. The ſervice of Baal erected by theſe two Queens, was deſtroyed as ſoon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Prieſts of that Religion, ſlain. Herein alſo it came to paſs, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who ſlew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the ſame hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who ſeems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning Children, all belonging to Jezabel periſhed in few days after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; ſhe had Sons living after ſhe was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were ſlain with her, we do not find.

This

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the Children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearly, and been registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every Man shall die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the House of Baal with the spoil of it; likely it is that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehoiada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, for the security of the King and his Friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as Heirs of their Mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his Wars against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehoiada might with the more confidence, adventure to take Arms against their Mother, that was desolate.

Deut. 24. 16.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the Building of Carthage.

Of Joas his doings whilst Jehoiada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas a Child of seven Years old or there-about, began his Reign which continued almost forty Years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that Honourable Man Jehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his Ancestors. When he came to Mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehoiada two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a Zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehoiada was fain to be quickned by his admonition. Mony was gathered for the charges of the work, partly out of the Tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the People: who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with Vessels of Gold and Silver, and with all other Utensils. The Sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the Service of God was magnificently celebrated.

2 Chron. 24. v. 14.

§. II.

The death of Jehoiada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUT this endured no longer than the life of Jehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty Years, died before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the Race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that House, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the People; it being said, They buried him in the City of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

2 Kings 12.

For after the death of Jehoiada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgat, not only the benefits, received by this worthy Man his old Counsellor, but also the good Precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all goodness. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen Years; that thirty Years, or thereabout, of the Reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to clear it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the Service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the Stage, he had striven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed Religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians invading Juda in the days of Joas.

BUT God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of Men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistims, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty did did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the War (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramath Gilead. Yet I think he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extream misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not promised such easie and good success, as might rather advance, than any way disturb, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the Sons of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the War between him and Israel, but to joyn all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who, like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their Mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. Howsoever it were, we find it plainly, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the Gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which Present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible Man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty seventh of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz he made this purchace; but in the same or the very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his Son Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

2 King. 12. 18.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that War of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second Book of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one War. For the former was compounded without bloodshed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battel, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrarywise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the Son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of Men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Army.

2 Chron. 24. 24.

Now concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehoiada the Priest, because that story is joyned unto the restauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoiada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Book of Kings, or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure, neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous Man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgments upon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithal, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the days of Jehoiada; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the six, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his Raign, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foul Idolater.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious Men, God keepeth a more even, and more strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedness be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy Man did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had stroven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

Psal. 115. 15.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia, the Son of Jehoiada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a Man so honourable, and Son to a Man so exceeding beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his Father had born unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits, which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a Man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this King Joas having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Saviour dealt with the heir of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deserving were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this Holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any form of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I do neither read nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publick judgment; though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Juda.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THis odious murder, committed by an unthankful snake upon the Man in whose bosome he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well deserved curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monster. It was the last year of his raign; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live how he listed, without controlment. When that year was expired, the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to perform any great action; for they came with a small company of Men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

2 Chron. 24. 24.

That Joas naturally was a Coward, his bloody malice against his best friend, is, in my judgment proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might have levied (as his Son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen Men for the War, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, he took a very great Army; so that wise-men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Country, and expose his person to danger of War, when as indeed all was meer ostentation, and no peril to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise-men think, and laugh at him in secret, considering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this World is foolishness, did laugh, not only at this vain-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a rebel to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abulensis and others expound the Story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being, (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented to wring out of him an excessive ransom.

And surely all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great langnor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill favouredly. Now at that time, Joas the Son of Jehoahas reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the Son of Hazael over the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country; the other inferior every way to his Father, of whose purchaces he left a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as after followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his Spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of War at his doors, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill success, which the Aramites found in their following Wars against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakness of all earthly might resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his ordinance, both the Kingdom of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of enemies; and the Kingdom of Israel, having so been troden down by Hazael, that only fifty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Footmen were left, prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods Children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our Heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our Fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoil, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the Sons of an Ammonitess, and of a Moabitess, whom some (because only their Mothers names being strangers, are expressed) think to have been Bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, lest (as Tyrants use) he should should revenge his disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells us plainly, that, for the blood of the Children of Jehoiada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the Son and Successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdom was established: but contrariwise, his body was judged unworthy of burial in the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zecharia caused the Treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Son, upon the Traytors, with well-deserved death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeding unto Ophratanes, began his Reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdom of Ægypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the Reign of Pygmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages; some reporting it to be seventy years younger than Rome, others above four hundred years elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight Months from the building of Salomon's Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pygmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make clear the total summ. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did misswrite, some number of the years, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pygmalion; we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian Writers, out of whose Books he gives us the whole summ, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other, than the memory of three or four generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomon's Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram.

Ilia ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit erat mens,
Vita nec incestis laeta cupidinibus
(Namque nec Æneas vidit me Troius unquam, Nec Lybiam aavenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma procacis Iarba,
Servavi, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, eqstou quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut laeso quidus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere famae,
Ulta virum, positis manibus oppetii.
Invida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret ut nostra damna pudicitiae?
Vos magis historicis lectores credite de me,
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusque canunt.
Falsidici vates, temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos assimulant vitiis.

Ausonius Ep. 117.

Which in effect is this:

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imagrie.
Like this I was, but had not such a Soul,
As Maro feigned, incestuous and foul.
Æneas never with his Trojan Host
Beheld my face, or landed on this Coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villany,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousie;
I did with weapon chast, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Reveng'd my Husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'st thou stir up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, believe Historians; not those Which to the World Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are liars, and for Verses sake
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick War, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and Conquests, we find in many Histories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affairs before that War, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts upon the Isle of Sicily. We will therefore defer the relation of matters concerning that mighty City, untill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reign. Of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

A*Mazias*, the Son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning Reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great Persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones, (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable murther, committed by the King upon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of God's Justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their Fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his Father the art of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead Body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done was applauded as the handy work of GOD) had neither any mighty partakers in their Fact, nor strong maintainers of their Persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his Government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of Mens affections, being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their Treasons and God's Judgment, which, by their Treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their Children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the Office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging Son. This being done, and his own Life the better secured, by such exemplary Justice, against the like Attempts; Amazia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen Years.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long Peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in Power, by following the War hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sin had God so plagued the House of Jehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his Son Jehoahaz. But as God's Benefits to Jehu sufficed not to withdraw him from this politick Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended unto the Prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miserable Subjects, were obstinate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters, the ten Tribes recovered apace, but the favour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they sought; that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim. 2 Chron. 25. 7.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the Prosperity of the Israelites under the Reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavy Cares attending those unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the Burthen upon his hopeful Son; we find that in the thirty seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the Son of Jehoahaz began to reign over Israel in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his Father's Reign, and some two or three years before his death. 2 Kings 13. 10.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor Stock which he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seem likely to prove a thriver. Among other Circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no less. For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus; O my Father, my Father, the Chariot of Israel, and the Horsemen of the same, by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the Prayers of this holy Man had stood his Kingdom in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could do. 2 Kings 13. 14.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first year of Joram the Son of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elia was doubled, or did rest upon him; it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raise a dead Child unto Life, as Elias had done, but when he himself was dead, it pleased God that his dead Bones should restore Life unto a Carcass, which touched them in the Grave. In fine he bestowed, as a Legacy, three Victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his War against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Joas.

THE happy success which Joas had found in his War against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of undertaking some Expedition, wherein himself might purchase the like Honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable Men for the Wars; and his Treasures were sufficient for the payment of these and the hire of many more. Cause of War he had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his Grandfather Jehoram had about fifty years been unreclaimed; partly by means of the Troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his Father Joas. Yet, forasmuch as the Men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of War (excepting that unhappy Fight wherein they were beaten by a few Bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of Wisdom to increase his Forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred Talents of Silver, an hundred thousand valiant Men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Josephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand. 2 Chron. 21. 6. Jos. Ant. Jud. l. 9. cap. 10.

This

This great Army, which with ſo much coſt Amazia had hired out of Iſrael, he was fain to diſmiſs, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill ſucceſs, if he ſtrengthned himſelf with the help of thoſe Men, whom God (though in mercy he gave them Victory againſt the cruel Aramites) did not love, becauſe they were Idolaters. The Iſraelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diſmiſſion, as an high diſgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and ſhewed their malice in the ſlaughter of three thouſand Men; and ſome Spoil, which they carried away. But Amazia with his own Forces, knowing that God would be aſſiſtant to their Journey, entered couragiouſly into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining Victory, he ſlew ten thouſand, and took other ten thouſand Priſoners, all which he threw from an high Rock; holding them, it ſeems, rather as Traitors, than as juſt Enemies. This Victory did not ſeem to reduce Edom under the ſubjection of the Crown of Juda, which might be the cauſe of that ſeverity, which was uſed to the Priſoners; the Edomites that had eſcaped, refuſing to buy the Lives of their Friends and Kinſmen at ſo dear a rate, as the loſs of their own Liberty. Some Towns in Mount Seir, Amazia took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places moſt indefenſible, in that he left no Garriſons there, whereby he might another year the better have purſued the Conqueſt of the whole Country. Howſoever it were, he got both Honour by the Journey, and Gains enough, had he not loſt himſelf.

Among other Spoils of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquiſhed and taken Priſoners, did deſerve well to be led in Triumph. But they contrariwiſe, I know not by what ſtrange Witchcraft, ſo beſotted this unworthy King Amazia, that he ſet them up to be his Gods, and worſhipped them, and burned incenſe unto them.

2 Chron. 25. 14.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet ſent from God, he gave a churliſh and threatning anſwer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counſellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worſt. If either the coſtly ſtuff, whereof theſe Idols were made, or the curious Workmanſhip and Beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had raviſhed the Kings fancy; methinks he ſhould have rather turned them to matter of Profit, or kept them as Houſhold Ornaments and things of Pleaſure, than thereby have ſuffered himſelf to be blinded, with ſuch unreaſonable devotion towards them. If the ſuperſtitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his Imagination; much more ſhould the bad ſervice which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it ſeems to me, that the ſame affections carried him from God, unto the ſervice of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk ſo roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and ſent away ſuch Auxiliary Forces as he had gathered out of Iſrael; which done, it is ſaid that he was encouraged, and led forth his People, thinking belike, that God would now rather aſſiſt him by Miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his Hearts deſire. But with better Reaſon he ſhould have limited his Deſires by the will of God, whoſe pleaſure it was, that Eſau, having broken the Yoke of Jacob from his Neck, accordingly as Iſaac had foretold, ſhould no more become his Servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to re-conquer all the Country of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet ſo, that he brought home both Profit and Honour, which might have well contented him.

2 Chron. 25. 11.

But there is a fooliſh and a wretched Pride, wherewith Men being tranſported, can ill endure to aſcribe unto God the honour of thoſe Actions, in which it hath pleaſed him to uſe their own induſtry, courage or foreſight. Therefore it is commonly ſeen, that they, who entring into Battel are careful to pray for Aid from Heaven, with due acknowledgment of his Power who is the giver of Victory; when the Field is won, do vaunt of their own Exploits: one telling how he got ſuch a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to ſuch a Battalion; a third, how he ſeized on the Enemies Cannon; every one ſtriving to magnifie himſelf, whilſt all forget God, as one that had not been preſent in the Action. To aſcribe to Fortune the effects of another Man's Vertue, is, I confeſs, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better ſucceſs, than he did, or in reaſon might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happineſs; ſo he whoſe meer wiſdom and labour hath brought things to a proſperous iſſue, is doubly bound to ſhew himſelf thankful, both for the Victory, and for thoſe Vertues by which the Victory was gotten. And indeed ſo far from weakneſs is the nature of ſuch thankſgiving, that it may well be called the height of Magnanimity; no Vertue being ſo truly Heroical, as that by which the Spirit of a Man advanceth it ſelf with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which ſenſe it is a brave Speech that Evander in Virgil, uſeth to Æneas, none but a Chriſtian being capable of the admonition.

Aude hoſpes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philoſophy Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his Head: he had ſhewed himſelf a better Man of War than any King of Juda, ſince the time of Jehoſhaphat, and could be well contented, that his people ſhould think him little inferiour to David: of which Honour he ſaw no reaſon why the Prophets ſhould rob him, who had made him loſe an hundred Talents, and done him no pleaſure, he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any Miracle at all. That he was diſtempered with ſuch vain thoughts as theſe (beſides the witneſs of his impiety following) Joſephus doth teſtifie; ſaying, That he deſpiſed GOD, and that being puft up with his good Succeſs, of which nevertheleſs he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Joas King of Iſrael to become his Subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Sovereign, as they had done his Anceſtors King David and King Salomon. Some think that his Quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Iſraelites, whom he diſmiſſed in the Journey againſt Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the ſenſe of a late Wrong had more power to ſtir him up, than the remembrance of an old Title forgotten long ſince, and by himſelf neglected, thirteen or fourteen years. Nevertheleſs it might ſo be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would alſo call old matters into queſtion; that that ſo the Kings of Iſrael might, at the leaſt, learn to keep their Subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amazia deſired only Recompence for the Injury done to him, it is not improbable that he ſhould have had ſome reaſonable Anſwer from Joas, who was not deſirous to fight with him. But the Anſwer which Joas returned, likening himſelf to a Cedar, and Amazia in reſpect of him to no better than a Thiſtle, ſhews that the Challenge was made in inſolent terms, ſtuft perhaps with ſuch proud compariſon of Nobility, as might be made (according to that which Joſephus hath written) between a King of ancient Race, and one of leſs Nobility than Vertue.

Sophocles in Ajace Lon.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when, going to the War of Troy, his Father did bid him to be valiant, and get Victory by God's aſſiſtance, he made anſwer, that by God's aſſiſtance, a Coward could get Victory, but he would get it alone without ſuch help: after which proud ſpeech, though he did many valiant acts, he had ſmall thanks, and finally killing himſelf in a madneſs, whereinto he fell upon diſgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of Burial. That Amazia did utter ſuch words, I do not find: but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of ſuch words, he was rewarded with ſucceſs according. The very firſt Council wherein this War was concluded, ſerves to prove that he was a wiſe Prince indeed at Jeruſalem, among his Paraſites; but a Fool when he had to deal with his Equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak People, truſting more in the ſite of their Country than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from ſo poor beginnings had raiſed himſelf to ſuch ſtrength, that he was able to lend his Friend an hundred thouſand Men, and had all his Nation exerciſed, and trained up, in a long victorious War. But as Amazia diſcovered much want of Judgment, in undertaking ſuch a Match; ſo in proſecuting the Buſineſs, when it was ſet on foot, he behaved himſelf as a Man of little Experience, who having once only tried his Fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in War there was nothing elſe to do, than ſend a Defiance, fight, and win. Joas on the contrary ſide; having been accuſtomed to deal with a ſtronger Enemy than the King of Juda, uſed that celerity, which peradventure had often ſtood him in good ſtead againſt the Aramite. He did not ſit waiting till the Enemies brake in and waſted his Country, but preſented himſelf with an Army in Juda, ready to bid Battel to Amazia, and ſave him the labour of a long Journey. This could not but greatly diſcourage thoſe of Juda; who (beſides the impreſſion of fear which an Invaſion beats into people, not inured to the like) having devoured, in their greedy hopes, the Spoil of Iſrael, fully perſwading themſelves to get as much, and at as eaſie a rate, as in the Journey of Edom, were ſo far diſappointed of their expectation, that well they might ſuſpect all new aſſurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithſtanding, their King that had ſtomach enough to challenge the Patrimony of Salomon, thought like another David, to win it by the Sword. The iſſue of which fool-hardineſs might eaſily be foreſeen in humane Reaſon; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the firſt and ominous beginning of the War. But meer humane Wiſdom, howſoever it might foreſee much, could not have prognoſticated all the miſchief that fell upon Amazia. For as ſoon as the two Armies came in ſight, God, whoſe help this wretched Man had ſo deſpiſed, did (as Joſephus reports it) ſtrike ſuch terrour and amazement into the Men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to ſhift for himſelf, which he did ſo ill, that his Enemy had ſoon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into moſt abject baſeneſs. That the Army which fled, ſuſtained any other loſs than of Honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Joſephus; it being likely that the ſoon beginning of their flight, which made it the more ſhameful, made it alſo the more ſafe. But of the miſchief that followed this overthrow, it was God's will that Amazia himſelf ſhould ſuſtain the whole diſgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jeruſalem, where he bad him procure that the Gates might be opened, to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwiſe with preſent death. So much amazed was the miſerable Caitive, with theſe dreadful words, that he durſt do none other, than perſwade the Citizens, to yield themſelves to the mercy of the Conqueror. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker ſtate, held out two years, againſt Nebuchadnezzar, was utterly diſmayed, when the King, that ſhould have given his life to ſave it, uſed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the Gates of Jeruſalem were opened to Joas, with which honour (greater than any King of Iſrael had ever obtained) he could not reſt contented, but, the more to deſpight Amazia and his People, he cauſed four hundred Cubits of the Wall to be thrown down, and entered the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in Triumph. This done, he ſackt the Temple, and the King's Pallace, and ſo, taking Hoſtages of Amazia, he diſmiſſed the poor Creature that was glad of his Life, and returned to Samaria.

A Diſcourſe of the Reaſons hindering Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Iſrael, when he had won Jeruſalem, and held Amazia Priſoner. The end of Joas his Reign.

WE may juſtly marvel how it came to paſs, that Joas, being thus in poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, having the King in his hands, his Enemies Forces broken, and his own entire, could be ſo contented to depart quietly, with a little Spoil, when he might have ſeized upon the whole Kingdom. The Reign of Athalia had given him cauſe to hope, that the Iſſue of David might be diſpoſſeſſed of that Crown; his own Nobility, being the Son and Grand-Child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might alſo have preferred his form of Government, before that of their own Kings, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when a long Succeſſion of wicked Princes had ſmothered the thanks, which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enſued, upon the union of all the twelve Tribes, under one Prince, is ſo apparent, that I need not to inſiſt on it. That any meſſage from God forbad the Iſraelites (as afterwards in the Victory which Peka the Son of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his preſent advantage, to the beſt uſe, we do not read. All this makes it the more difficult to reſolve the Queſtion, why a Prince

so well exercised, as Joas had been, in recovering his own, and winning from his Enemy, should forsake the possession of Jerusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so fair a Conquest, as the Kingdom of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others, had been most material, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seen, that entring Jerusalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own Prosperity. For the opening of the Gates had been enough to have let him not only into the City, but into the Royal Throne, and the Peoples Hearts, whom by fair intreaty (especially having sure means of compulsion) he might have made his own, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunity presented, he did not aim at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanly busied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entring as an Enemy, and shewing what he could do, by spending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the City done Offices of a Friend, and laboured to shew good Will to the Inhabitants. But when his Pride had done, his Covetousness began, and sought to please it self, with that which is commonly most ready to the spoiler, yet should be most forborn. The Treasure wherewith Sisac, Hazael, and the Philistims, Men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternal God, whose Temple was at Jerusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the consecrated vessels, calling the Family of Obed Edom (whose Children had Hereditary Charge of the Treasury) to a strict account, as if they had been Officers of his own Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their Brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our Age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoided; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few days, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Souldiers to be no better than Men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the Inhabitants of so great a City. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty Town entered by Capitulation, as to enter the Gates opened by unadvised fear. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their Spirits, and begin to understand their first Error; they will think upon every advantage, of Place, of Provisions, of Multitude, yea of Women armed with Tilestones, and rather chuse by desperate Resolution, to correct the Evils grown out of their former Cowardise, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the Body, which in such half-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakness of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard Terms, that it opened the Gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly professing himself either Friend or Foe to the Estate, entered the Town with his Army, in triumphant manner, himself and his Horse armed, with his Lance upon his Thigh. Many Insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of Quarrel ministred, between them and the Townsmen: so far forth that the Florentines, to preserve their Liberty, were driven to prepare for Fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable Conditions, demanding huge Summs of ready Money, and the absolute Seignory of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the City in Arms. But Peter Caponi, a principal Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretary, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptory words made the French bethink themselves, and come readily to this Agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not half of that Money to be paid in hand, Charles should not only depart in Peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion; and continue their assured Friend. So dangerous a matter did it seem for that brave Army, which in few Months after wan the Kingdom of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous City. It is true, that Charles had other Business (and so perhaps had Joas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to Reason. In such cases the firing of Houses, usually draws every Citizen to save his own, leaving Victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, Women can quench, as fast as the Enemy having other things to look unto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardful of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of destroying a Town, forsakes the assurance of a good Composition. Diversity of Circumstance may alter the Case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Jerusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

2 Chron. 26. 15.

How strongly soever Joas might hold himself within Jerusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his Booty safe, if the Army of Juda, which had been more terrified than weakened in the late Encounter, should reinforce it self, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take Hostages for his better security, his Army being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the City and without, serving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aspiring to the Crown of Juda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Joas had smitten the ground with his Arrows thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three Victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, sixth and seventh years of Joas, after which time if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, ill might the King of Israel have likened himself to a stately Cedar, and worse could he have either lent the Judaan one hundred thousand Men, or meet him in Battel, who was able to bring into the Field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Elisha, that after three Victories, Joas should find some change of Fortune, and suffer loss; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this Year, it being the last of his Reign. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas his absence, gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his return return was not able to remedy, but rather sell himself into new misfortunes, which increased the calamity, we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his Son For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Israel from under the Heaven, he preserved them by the hand of Jeroboam, the Son of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Raign of Joas was concluded with a sad Catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his misery and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they took to set upon him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Army that lay abroad in the Country, to bid him battel in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his own Country, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these; Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdom of Juda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all hast homewards, where he found a sad welcome, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperity, forsook also his life in few months after, leaving his Kingdom to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant Son.

The end of Amazia his Raign and Life.

ANy Man is able to guess how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted so much of his own great prowess and skill in arms, threatning to work wonders, and set up anew the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lions hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had been painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtless, were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are always prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happened by their own default) there was no Child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischief. He had not only challenged a good Man of War, being himself a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common Enemy, to have him let into the City, that with his own eyes he might see what spoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-say. The Father of this Amazia, was a beastly Man; yet when the Arumites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the City and Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered; should they have made his promise good? Surely the hast which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soon have been rid of him, seeing that the Arumites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trussed up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have served to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up Hostages, to secure his return, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem; a manifest proof that he was not reclaimed, unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a Man in his adversity of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Priests and Prophets were less welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might always be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battel. David himself had abandoned the City, leaving it, before the Enemy was in sight, unto Absalom his rebellious Son. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have been kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, he should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good servants ought not to have obeyed their Masters commandments, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not Master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame, of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it self, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loss. For had he been as hasty to flie, as others were; he might have escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royal example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yield; having neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved; the Enemy having wisely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captain, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags, that followed him.

2 Chron. 25. 27.

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But he that was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good success foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster, unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seems that he meant to keep himself safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteen years following (so long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his Subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his own ruine. He that suspecteth his own worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the less regard is had of his person, than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authority, in purchasing the name of a severe Man. For the affected sowrenes of a vain fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the fear wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carries a shew of reverence, to him that does the Wrong; at least it serves to dazle the Eyes of Underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakness of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, Men might attain to be such as they ought, they do usually misspend, in seeking to appear such as they are not. This is a vain and deceivable course; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unable Spirit, being over-perted with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to believe, that he did not love them? The best was that he had, by revenging his Fathers death, provided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance; (or upon whom?) of such a murther, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his anointed. Yet as Amazia, careless of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; so his Subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such head long fury, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the City, and flie to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, and so general, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his presence in the Country abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionless, he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands: for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Army for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost City of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territory of the Philistims, or the Kingdom of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town, added their own treason to the general insurrection; the murtherers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his body to Jerusalem, where they gave him burial with his Fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath already been shewed, that the raigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years; otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his Fathers Raign, or the foremost of his Sons. But we are now arrived at a meer vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amazia King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Israel fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteen years compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amazia was made King over Israel) had raigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzzia, who is also called Azaria, unto his Father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to Raign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the sixteenth year of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fifty that he Raigned. So the Interregnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter sounds.

2 Chron. 25. 2. & 2 King 14. 17.

2 King. 14. 23.

2 King. 15. 1.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was eleven years under age, that is five years old, when his Father died, and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the text it self may have suffered some Wrong, by miswriting twenty seven for seventeen years, and so, by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be salved. These are the conjectures of that worthy Man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the author himself doth easily let it pass, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his raign being five years old; but then must we add those eleven years which passed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so careful to avoid an interregnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessity hath enforced all good writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdom of Israel? The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's Raign, and such another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Juda, when Amazia was slain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea although the neceſſity of computation were not ſo apparent.

For the publick fury, having ſo far extended it ſelf, as unto the deſtruction of the Kings own perſon, was not like to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſs of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to break forth into ſuch extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to paſs, that they which already had thrown themſelves into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being inveſted in all ornaments of regality, is nevertheleſs expoſed to many injuries, proceeding from headſtrong and forgetful Subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been King but one and forty years, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the text. The beſt opinion were that, which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of raign with his Father, before he began to raign ſingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not ſwallow up almoſt the whole raign of Joas, and extending the years of thoſe which raigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the ſhorteſt the Raigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: every Man may follow his own opinion, and ſee mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for theſe purpoſes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amazia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Alladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleſtus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthæ, Amychæ, and ſome other Towns.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazia ſucceeding his Father Ocraxapes or Anacyndaraxes, raigned twenty years, and was ſlain the laſt of the eleven void years which forewent the Raign of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand two hundred and forty years. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among Strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he lived an unhappy life, knowing himſelf to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any Man have a ſight of him; yet ſeen he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a Man diſguiſed in Womans attire, and ſtriving to counterfeit an Harlot, that he thought it great ſhame to live under the command of ſo unworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelf and others from ſo baſe ſubjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with this prophecy, did promiſe unto Beloſus himſelf the government of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſineſs, one of them ſtirred up the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrel, the other perſwaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelves in the ſame cauſe. Theſe four Nations armed forty thouſand Men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelf, but gathering ſuch Forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountered the Rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, anſwer to the manner of his retiredneſs. For in three battels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into ſuch fearful terms, that had not Beloſus promiſed them conſtantly ſome unexpected ſuccours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the ſame time, an Army out of Baſtria was coming to aſſiſt the King; but Arbaces encountring it upon the way, perſwaded ſo ſtrongly by promiſe of liberty, that thoſe Forces joyned themſelves with his. The ſudain departure of the Enemy ſeeming to be a flight, cauſed Sardanapalus to feaſt his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being ſtrengthened with this new ſupply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great ſecurity, was unprepared for reſiſtance.

This overthrow did ſo weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives brother Salamenus to keep the Field, he withdrew himſelf into the City of Ninive; which, till new aids that he ſent for ſhould come, he thought eaſily to defend; it having been propheſied, that Ninive ſhould never be taken, till the River were enemy to the town. Of the greatneſs and ſtrength of Ninive, enough hath been ſpoken in our diſcourſe of Ninus. It was ſo well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Army, and ſlain Salamenus) was fain to lie two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he ſaw no appearance. It ſeems that he wanted Engines and skill to force thoſe walls, which were a hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to paſs upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tygris did in the third: for being high ſwoln with rains, it not only drowned a part of the City through which it ran; but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accompliſhment of the old Oracle, or ſeeing no means of reſiſtance left, ſhutting up himſelf into his Pallace, with his Wives, Eunuchs and all his treaſures, did ſet the houſe on fire, wherewith he and they were together conſumed. Strabo ſpeaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a City of Cilicia, whereon was found an inſcription, ſhewing that he built that City and Tharſus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding Men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraging other, with verſes well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example, teſtifie that his nature was more prone to ſenſuality, than to any vertue beſeeming a Prince. Strabo, l. 4.

There are ſome that faintly report otherwiſe of his end; ſaying that Arbaces, when he firſt found him among his Concubines, was ſo enraged, that ſudainly he ſlew him with a dagger. But the more general conſent of writers agree with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Cteſias a Greek writer, that lived in the Court of Perſia, where the truth might beſt be known. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith, that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and oblivion hath oppressed them. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 2.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of UZZIA.

The prosperity of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who Reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem and Pekahia.

Uzzia, who is also called Azaria the Son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the Son of Joas King of Israel. He served the God of his Father David, and had therefore good success in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Town that stood near to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistims, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the mastry over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him Tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous Wars, wherein (as Josephus reheareseth his Acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army consisted of three hundred and seven thousand Men of War, over which were appointed two thousand six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared Shields, and Spears, and Helmets, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late Predecessors had held, who thought it better policy to use the service of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to War the Princes and all the Chariots.

2 Chro. 26. 14.

2 Chro. 21. 9.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the atchievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent works, equal, if not superior to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For besides that great Conquests are wont to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happiness to get. He turned his Lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient to such Husbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding, whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattel and Herdsmen, he built Towers in the Wildernes. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them Watercourses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found Water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith; questionless he took the only course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Towns among the Philistims; he repaired the Wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the Son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many Victories, against the Syrians, he wan the Royal City of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the Country there about from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) unto the vast Desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had been in the Reign of David.

2 Reg. 14. 25, 28.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well; for he was an Idolater; it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the success of War, and to throw the victorious Aramites, under the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu, to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth Generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited unto repentance, by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, was held so pretious, that neither the Kingdom it self, given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry; nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity, of Jeroboam the Son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the only giver of Victory. Wherefore the promise of God, made unto Jehu, that his Sons, unto the fourth Generation, should sit on the Throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly guess at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

2 Reg. 10. 13.

When Jeroboam the Son of Joas, after a victorious Reign of one and forty years, had ended his life, it seems in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith have been admitted, to Reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four

Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown paſſed by election, muſt needs have appeared baſe; and the vertue of the laſt King, having been ſo great, as might well ſerve to lay the foundation of a new Houſe, much more to eſtabliſh the already confirmed right of a family ſo rooted in poſſeſſion. All this notwithſtanding, two or three and twenty years did paſs before Zacharia the Son of Jeroboam was, by uniform conſent, received as King. The true original cauſes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did ſtand: yet ſecond inſtruments of this diſturbance, are likely not to have been wanting, upon which, the wiſdom of Man was ready to caſt an Eye. Probable it is that the Captains of the Army (who afterwards ſlew one another, ſo faſt, that in fourteen years there Reigned five Kings) did now by headſtrong violence, rent the Kingdom aſunder, holding each what he could, and either deſpiſing or hating ſome qualities in Zacharia; until, after many years, wearied with diſſention, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent Man, they conſented to yield all quietly to the Son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy laſted almoſt three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time, between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the laſt of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his ſeven and twentieth concurring with the firſt of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the ſame Uzzia, in the laſt ſix months whereof, Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are ſome indeed that by ſuppoſing Jeroboam to have reigned with his Father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the ſame reaſon, abridge this Anarchy, that was before the Reign of Zacharia in Iſrael. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time ſufficient to prove that the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, was no leſs diſtempered, than as is already noted. But I chooſe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his Fathers Reign unto his own, which was it ſelf indeed ſo long, that he may well ſeem to have begun it very young: for I do not think, that God bleſſed this Idolater, both with a longer Reign, and with a longer life, than he did his Servant David.

Thus much being ſpoken of the time, wherein the Throne of Iſrael was void, before the Reign of Zacharia; little may ſuffice to be ſaid of his Reign it ſelf, which laſted but a little while. Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himſelf a worſhipper of the Golden Calves; which was enough to juſtifie the judgment of God, whereby he was ſlain. He was the laſt of Jehu's houſe, being (incluſively) the firſt of that line; which may have been ſome cauſe of the troubles impeaching his orderly ſucceſſion: the Prophecy having determined that race in the fourth Generation. But (beſides that Gods promiſe was extended unto the utmoſt) there was no warrant given to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu, for the ſlaughter of Jehoram, and for the eradication of Ahab's Houſe.

Zacharia having been ſix months a King, was then ſlain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the ſpace of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I do not find; ſave only that he was a Traitor, and the Son of one Jabeſh, whereby his Father got no honour. It ſeems that he was one of thoſe, who in time of Faction had laboured for himſelf; and now, when all other Competitors were ſitten down, thought eaſily to prevail againſt that King, in whoſe perſon the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifeſt it is, that Sallum had a ſtrong party: for Tiphſah or Thapſa, and the coaſt thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and ſupplanter, then lay, refuſed to admit, as King in his ſtead, the Man that murthered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his Treaſon, and was ſlain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

2 King. 15. 13.

Menahem the Son of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In oppoſition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane; For he not only deſtroyed Tiphſah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their Women with child, becauſe they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been uſed in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earneſt, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was firſt due. But in performing that office, there was uſed ſuch long deliberation, that we may plainly diſcover Ambition, Diſdain, and other private paſſions, to have been the cauſes of this beaſtly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it ſeems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul, King of Aſſyria, came againſt the Land of Iſrael; whom this new King appeaſed, with a thouſand Talents of Silver, levied upon all the ſubſtantial Men in his Country. With this mony the Iſraelite purchaſed, not only the peace of his Kingdom, but his own eſtabliſhment therein: ſome factious Man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) ſought to uſe his help, in depoſing this ill-beloved King. Joſephus reports of this Menahem, that his Reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his Tyranny ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Son, occupied his room.

Joſ. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

Of this Pekahia the ſtory is ſhort: for he reigned only two years; at the end whereof he was ſlain by Peka, the Son of Remalia, whoſe Treaſon was rewarded with the Crown of Iſrael, as, in time coming another Mans Treaſon againſt himſelf ſhall be. There needs no more, to be ſaid of Menahem, and his Son, ſave that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Son (as we find in Joſephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Aſſyrian King, who firſt opened unto thoſe Northern Nations the way into Paleſtina; it will ſhortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Beloſus (called alſo Beleſes, and by ſome, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, againſt Sardanapalus, or whether he were ſome other Man. At the preſent it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happineſs wherein we left him.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehoiada, that godly Prieſt, was the mean, to preſerve the lineage of David, in the perſon of Joas; ſo it appears, that the care of holy Men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up, and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred born to his Father Amazia, had endangered his Succeſſion. For it is ſaid of Uzzia, That he ſought God in the days of Zacharia (which underſtood the viſions of God) and when as he ſought the Lord, God made him proſper.

2 Chro. 26. 5.

But

V. 16. But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God: and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense, upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude, and civil policy, should have held back Uzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoever the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azaria the High Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand, how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the office of the Sons of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant Men, but their valour was shewed, only in assisting the High Priest, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himself performed. We find in Josephus, that the King had apparelled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, unless they would be quiet. Josephus, indeed enlargeth the story, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rouled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the High ways, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with Leprosie. All this may have been true; and some there are who think that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the days of Jeroboam King of Israel, who died seven and thirty years before Uzzia; so that Jotham the Son of Uzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this accompt, have been then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to Reign as King. Therefore, thus far only we have assurance; that while Uzzia, was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himself, untill he died; the rule over the Kings House, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son, and Successor. Jotham took not upon himself the stile of King, till his Father was dead; Whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

2 Chron. 26. 20.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Ægypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadia and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Joel, or Obadia, did propheste: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to S. Hierome's rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporary with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painfully been sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets? It seems to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas, who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to have prophesied in the days of Joas, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter, the Text it self intimating no less: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the Kingdom of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seems, not without reason, unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose days Ninevie was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expres promises of the Messias.

2 Chron. c. 14. vers. 25, 26.

In the raign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his Visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustin gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Books. The Prophet Esay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much Writing; or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the Son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellency, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Jerome saith) one would think he did not foretel of things to come, but compile an History of matters already past.

Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 29.

Hier. in præf. super Esaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Ægypt, and the ninth year of his raign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdom of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Asychis followed in the Kingdom of Ægypt, unto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Crown six years. Then Sabacus, an Æthiopian, became King of Ægypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Uzzia his raign and life. Of these and other Ægyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermedled with the business of Juda.

In Athens, the two last years of Ariphron his twenty, the seven and twentieth of Thespeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Æschilus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Sylvius Aventinus his seven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Silvius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Sylvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdom, in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his Son Sosarmus succeeded him, and raigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the story of the Assyrian Kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person; or heads of sundry Families, that Reigned apart in Ninive and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chief therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that War, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shewen upon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especial advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he used the counsel of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own Grace; allowing him to hold, not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezelling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) only the Soveraignty to himself, which to use immoderately he did naturally abhor. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Ninive; permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himself so greatly loved, that by slackning too much the Reins of his own Soveraignty, he did more harm to the general estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedom, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Country was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we find, in the Scriptures, to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fifth of Arbaces his Line, did make in that Government, by reducing them into stricter terms of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the Conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Ninive, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when, the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who Reigning afterwards in Babylon and Ninive, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy Man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgment of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtful case. Neither shall it be needful to set down apart the several authorities and arguments of sundry Men, adding somewhat of weight or of clearness one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine own, but meerly led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belosus was the same King who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Army; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this Man it is said, that he was a skilful Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he Reigned eight and forty years, and then dying, left the Kingdom to Teglat Phalasar his Son, in whose posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainsaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptory herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirm. They, who maintain this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no History at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belosus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it self, the chief Country of the Empire, bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meet to trust them in their own Walls and Houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Ninive by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needful policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down, from aspiring to recover the Soveraignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politick, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous even to Rome it self, that was Mistriss of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdom anew, under one Pul? or what must this Pul have been (of whose deservings, or intermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the War against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal part of the Empire fell, fell, either by general consent in division of the Provinces, or by his own power and purchace very soon after? Surely he was none other than Belosus; whose near Neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his own game) both to get Assyria to himself, and to empeach any other Man, that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a business: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the Gold and Silver that had been in the Palace of Ninive. And questionless to restore such a City as Ninive, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to have wanted.

Herodot. l. 1.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easie matter for him, to pass quite through another mans Kingdom with an Army, seeking booty afar off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belosus, Beleses, and Belestis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Son of Astyages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus, having setled his affairs in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdom, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, meerly for the love of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to pass over Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitful Province, adjoyning to their barren quarters, might yearly do them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loved not Israel, should for their own behoof have given him intelligence, of the destruction and civil broils among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavy Neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the Coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations divided by Euphrates hold together in so good terms of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memory whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the River came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to look into those parts; what a King raigning so far off as Ninive, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdom, had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

Joseph. ant. l. 10. cap. 12.

But concerning this last argument of the business which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no Man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belosus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage when it was faireſt, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did pass the River of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seem that the interregnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leisure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius do concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardful only of it self. Now, though some have conjectured that all Assyria was given to Belosus (as an overplus, besides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that he did only encroach upon that Province by little and little, whilst Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himself. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his raign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and setling of that Country, was work enough to hold Belosus occupied, besides the restauration of Ninive, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his raign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own days. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belosus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made until Belosus could find leisure; and the time of advantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his business in some other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate War, which overwhelmed the whole Country, not ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Ninive, must needs have so weakened the State of Assyria, that it could not in thirty years space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, raigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatness, forborn to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Country, did help to enable Belosus to subdue it; who having once extended his dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdoms, whereinto civil dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damascus, friends and cosins to the Chaldaans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belosus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artashasht, and Ahashuerosh, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countries, have called Nabopollassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our selves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belosus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belosus or Belesis were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity raigned both in Ninive and in Babylon; if he were Father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whom Salmanasar, Senacherib, and Asar-haddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmanasar, who is known to have reigned in those years, which Ptolomey the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabonassar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Asar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premisses, upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were several Kings. This consequence is so plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proved by his name, which is meerly Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassar's name, is proper to the Assyrians. It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, do shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolomy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Mero-dac-ken pad, but more briefly in Esay his prophecy, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the Son of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the Son of Baladan, King of Babel, were the Son of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it self. To conclude, Merodach began his raign over Babylon in the sixth year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanassar took Samaria; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one Man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofs from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the proving that Phul and Belosus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painful Men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annius his Authors given such offence, that Men refused thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine own part, howsoever I believe nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Book, though I find the names of one or two of these good fellows alledged in it: I have (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: nevertheless, I may say here again, that where other Histories are silent, or speak not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and serveth to explain or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painful Men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a Man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doors, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them Men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some Men doubt whether ther Scaliger's Reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean Name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders us from believing, that one Man in two Languages might be called by two several Names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer. Scal. Canon. l. 3.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the Negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldaans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their Sciences; so doth it not prove him, not to have been also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fifth, who was born in Gant, and Philip his Son, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had Men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posterity will not use this as an Argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs, It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did use the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars: but it seems, that he and his Posterity, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two unanswerable Arguments, (as Scaliger terms them, being me-thinks none other than Answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike sound and writing of those Names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no Man will dispute, for it is not likeness of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of Persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Esay, concerning Merodach the Son of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokempadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reign in the sixth year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in hast. I will therefore deferr the handling of these Objections, until I meet with their Subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus far will I here satisfie him; that how strong soever this Argument may seem, Scaliger himself did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the Son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have fashioned their Story, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belestis, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their Off-spring, making that of Pul to fail in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confess mine own want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this Narration into some such order, as might present unto us the Body of this History, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his Opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calvisius himself, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belesus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulassar, did reign, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set down Baladan, for the same Person with Nabonassar, Which Scaliger himself revoked. In this case therefore I must lay down the Plot of these divided Kingdoms, in such sort as I find it contrived by Augustinus Torniellus; who only of all that I have seen, sets down the Succession, Continuance, and Acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clerk of the Congregation of S. Paul, whose Annals were printed the last year; he appears to me a Man of curious Industry, sound Judgment, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetful of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Books he hath received good Information, and enriching his Works by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this Business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himself, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to do right unto Torniellus; but confess my self to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and emboldened me, to write more fully and less timorously in other things, which now I have not leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily passed out of my hand, and been exposed to other Mens constructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abraham, I find him adventuring; as I have done, to say, that they may probably be thought to have been some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. C. 1. §. 13.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mighty, sought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belosus; in which Contention, one Phul, a powerful Man in Assyria, sided with Belosus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty, that Arbaces made himself Sovereign Lord of all, and placed the Seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in four years, it came to pass, by the just Judgment of God, that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus, and instead of being his Viceroys, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later Opinion Torniellus him self leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former Supposition, resolving to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus devised, how Phul and Belosus might, at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time, and their Succeſſors, in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to Reign, and continues eight and forty Years. Theglathphalaſar (whoſe Name, and the Names of other Princes, I write diverſly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleaſed to diverſifie them) ſucceeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanaſſar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned ſeven: and when he was ſlain, Aſarhaddon his Son ten Years; in whom that Line failed.

The ſame time that Phul took upon him as King of Aſſyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for ſo it had been more likely) Beloſus uſurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threeſcore and eight years; at the leaſt threeſcore and eight Years did paſs, before Nabonaſſar followed him in the Poſſeſſion.

To Nabonaſſar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are aſſigned ſix and twenty Years: then, two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and laſtly, one and twenty to Naboleſſar, the Father of Nabuchadonoſor, who is like to offer matter of further diſputation.

Concerning the original of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly ſay, That the conjectures of other Men, who give all to Beloſus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly reſembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different ways, by which Phul might have gotten Aſſyria (for how Beloſus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Hiſtorians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the ſudden King of Aſſyria; or to give him ſo noble a Province, as would, of it ſelf, invite him to accept the Name and Power of a King, was a thing moſt unlikely to have happened, unleſs his deſerts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to ſo high a Reward. And for this cauſe (as I take it) hath he deviſed the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of ſo great a ſhare in the Empire. If this were a true or probable ſuppoſition, then would a new doubt riſe, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Hiſtorians? yea, why this Diviſion it ſelf, and the Civil Wars that cauſed it, were never heard of. Queſtionleſs, the interverting of ſome Treaſures by Beloſus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of far leſs note. Therefore I do not ſee, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either we muſt confeſs, the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his Merits, or elſe his Merits, and Name withall, to have been ſtrangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the Conjecture, inferring ſuch a Sequel, is wide of the Truth. As for the Rebellion of Phul and Beloſus againſt Arbaces, it was almoſt impoſſible for the Aſſyrians to recover ſuch ſtrength in four Years, as might ſerve to hold out in Rebellion: for Beloſus, it was needleſs to rebell, conſidering, that Arbaces did not ſeek to moleſt him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of Liberty) even the Medes, that were under his own Government, to do what they liſted.

But it is now fit that we peruſe the Catalogue of theſe Kings: not paſſing through them all (for ſome will require a large Diſcourſe in their own times) but ſpeaking of their order and time in general. If it be ſo unlawful to think, that ſome of Annius his Tales (let them all be counted his Tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, eſpecially ſuch, as contradict no acknowledged Truth, or apparent Likelihood, why then is it ſaid, that Phul did reign in Aſſyria eight and forty Years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of Years, to agree fitly with the courſe of things in Hiſtory: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius his Forgery (as queſtionleſs he is often guilty of this Crime) that when he tells Truth, or Probability, he be not believed for his own ſake; though for our own ſakes we make uſe of his boldneſs, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) we are unwilling our ſelves to be Authors of new, though not unprobable Conjectures. Herein we ſhall have this Commodity, that we may without bluſhing alter a little, to help our own Opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, againſt whom we ſhall be ſure to find Friends that will take our part.

The Reigns of Theglathphalaſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius his Meaſure, to the length of five and twenty Years the one, and ſeventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeven from the later of them, to fit (as I think) his own Computation; uſing the Liberty whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any Author, ſave our good Meteſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus gives the ſame length of Reign, which is found in Meteſthenes. I think there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much unto themſelves, as may well be allowed unto a Man ſo judicious as is Torniellus: yet could I wiſh, that he had forborn to condemn the followers of Annius, in this Buſineſs, wherein he himſelf hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt have done, almoſt nothing.

The like Liberty we find that he hath uſed in meaſuring the Reigns of the Chaldæans; filling up all the ſpace between the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight Years of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that he thought Beloſus might have begun his Reign ſomewhat later than Phul: for threeſcore and eight Years would ſeem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no young Man when he took poſſeſſion of it. But how is any whit of his Age abated by ſhortning his Reign, ſeeing his Life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private Man, enough for a long liver. Indeed, eight and forty Years had been ſomewhat of the moſt, conſidering that he ſeems by the ſtory to have been little leſs, at ſuch time as he joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty Years did well deſerve that note (which Torniellus adviſedly gives) that if his Reign extended not ſo far, then the Reign of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time unto Nabonaſſar.

I neither do reprehend the boldneſs of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modeſty of Scaliger and Sethus Calviſius, in forbearing to ſet down as warrantable, ſuch things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, muſt be deſcribed in Hiſtory, as Geographers in their Maps

describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-stone, with Head-Lands, Bays, great Rivers, and other Particularities, agreeable to common Report, though many times controlled by following Experience, and found contrary to Truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such Liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

——Neque fervidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Borea finitimum latus,
Duraeque sola Nives,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt aequora Nautae.

Nor Southern Heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence.
The subtil Shipmen way will find,
Storm never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, do serve only to mislead such Discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses, or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve always. To which purpose I remember a pretty Jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which methought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his Enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters Wives Island; saying, That whilst the Fellow drew that Map, his Wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Country for her; that she, in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the Blanks of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should run backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing. Here I will not say, that the credit, which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose Names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of Authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as have once gotten the credit of being general, so to deal as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the City to death. He lockt the Senators up within the State-house, and offered their lives to the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, until the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The Condemnation was hasty; for as fast as every Name was read, all the Town cried, Let him die: but the Execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious Vice of the Person, or baseness of his Condition, or insufficiency of his Quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and less Choice, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian Games, by Iphitus, in the Reign of the same King Uzzia, and in his one and fiftieth Year. It is, I know, the general Opinion, that these Games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that Opinion so general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to those Works of Time, which had no reference to their Affairs; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of Accompts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian Games and Exercises of Activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the Race by his own Foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his Body. They took Name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, near unto Elis; where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the Name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These Games were exercised from every fourth Year compleat, in the Plains of Elis, a City of Peloponnesus, near the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many Years, till Iphitus by Advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lycurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till the Reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great. Aul. Gell. l. 1. c. 1. ex Plut. Plut. out of Hermippus.

From this Institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times, and their Stories, to be certain: but reckoned all before either doubtful, or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the Reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Castor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crœsus, and Crœsus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus. Plin. l. 36. cap. 4.

Many patient and piercing Brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely to set them in the true Year of the World, and the Reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first Accompt, that is, of the Worlds Year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osias or Azarias.

Euſeb. de Præp. Evang. l. 10. cap. 3.

Euſebius who is contrary to himſelf in this Reckoning, accompts with thoſe that find the firſt Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundreth and ſixth year after Troy, yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzzia, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Eratoſt. apud Clem. Alexand. Strom. l. 1.

Eratoſthenes placeth the firſt Olympiad four hundred and ſeven years after Troy, reckoning the years that paſſed between; to whom Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The diſtance between the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy to the deſcent of Hercules his Poſterity into Peloponneſus, were fourſcore years; thence to the Ionian Expedition, threeſcore years; from that Expedition to the time of Lycurgus his Government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eighty years. In this Account the firſt year of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were, to ſeek the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of a Date far more uncertain. Let it ſuffice, that by knowing the inſtauration of theſe Games, to have been in the four hundreth and eight year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, ſetting that, and other Accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, muſt teach us how to find when they began.

To this good uſe, we have the enſuing years, unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided, by the ſame Eratoſthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourſcore and ſeventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, eight and forty years; forwards to the Victory of Lyſander, ſeven and twenty; to the Battel of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Maccedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole ſumm ariſeth to four hundred fifty and three years; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the Inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah, we have Arguments, grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his Reign, and the death of Alexander; as alſo upon the Aſtronomical calculation of ſundry Eclipſes of the Sun, as of that which happened when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his Reign as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the firſt year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years; they who give him but twenty nine years of Reign (following Herodotus, rather than Tully, Juſtine, Euſebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander ſet by all good Writers, in the firſt year of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexander's Death, ſerves well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like Obſervations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, we ſhall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his Reign, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to ſignifie a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the firſt year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Perſian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which laſted but ſeven years, we find compleat two hundred and ſeven years, which was the continuance of the Perſian Empire.

Now therefore ſeeing that the firſt year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the laſt of the ſixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth year from the inſtitution of thoſe Games by Iphitus) followed the laſt of the ſeventy years, of the captivity of Juda, and deſolation of the Land of Iſrael; manifeſt it is, that we muſt reckon back thoſe ſeventy years, and one hundred threeſcore and ten years more, the laſt which paſſed under the Kings of Juda, to find the firſt of theſe Olympiads; which by this Accompt is the one and fiftieth of Uzzia, as we have already noted.

The Eclipſes whereof we made mention, ſerve well to the ſame purpoſe. For Examples ſake, that which was ſeen when Xerxes muſtered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundreth threeſcore and ſeventh year of Nabonaſſar, being the laſt of the threeſcore and fourteenth Olympiad; leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the threeſcore and ten years, unto the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; and ſo upwards through the Reigns of the laſt Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia.

Thus much may ſuffice, concerning the time wherein theſe Olympiads began.

To tell the great ſolemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourſe of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a ſuperfluous labour. It is enough to ſay, that all bodily Exerciſes, or the moſt of them, were therein practiſed; as Running, Wraſtling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Maſtery in thoſe Feats, whereof there was good uſe, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of Exerciſes, that ſerved only for oſtentation. Thither alſo repaired Orators, Poets, Muſicians, and all that thought themſelves excellent in any laudable Quality, to make trial of their Skill. Yea the very Cryers, which proclaimed the Victories, contended which of them ſhould get the honour, of having played the beſt part.

The Eleans were Preſidents of thoſe Games; whoſe Juſtice, in pronouncing without Partiality, who did beſt, is highly commended. As for the Rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm, or Olive, without any other Commodity following, than the Reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held ſo much, that when Diagoras had ſeen his three Sons crowned for their ſeveral Victories in thoſe Games, one came running to him with this Gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cœlum aſcenſurus es; that is; Die, Diagoras, For thou ſhalt not climb up to Heaven: as if there could be no greater happineſs on Earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like ſenſe Horace ſpeaks of theſe Victors, calling them,

Quos Elea domum reducit
Palma Cœleſtes.

Such as like heavenly Wights do come
With an Elean Garland home.

Neither

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the Songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had won these Olympian Prises; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to have won the Victory at Running or Wrastling in those Games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous Victory, or Conquest of a Province. Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco.

That these Olympian Games were celebrated at the Full of the Moon, and upon the fifteenth day of the Month Hecatombaon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Month begin with the new Moon, that the fifteenth day might be the Full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their Games, whom I shall meet in more serious Employments, when the Persian Quarrels draw the Body of this History into the Coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

JOtham the Son of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the [illegible] of Juda, and in the Forests, Towers, and Pala[illegible] he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundreth Talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand Measures: he reigned six and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this Testimony. Ejusmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo juste præfuerit, urbem ipsam tanto sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus felix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a Man could find no kind of Vertue wanting in him: he worshipped God so religiously, he governed his Men so righteously, he was so provident for the City, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his Vertue and Proweſs he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his Enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy. 2 Kings 15. 33.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his Reign was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himself was devout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Pheleſtem in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the Race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglathphalasser, or Tiglathpeleser, the Son of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new Race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galilee, with those of Gilead, over Jordan, and carried the Inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius finds, that with his Son Salmanassar he reigned yet two years longer: which years I would not ascribe to the Son; because the Æra of Nabonassar begins with his single Reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himself, who therewith reigned seven and twenty years. 2 King. 15.

Æschylus, the Son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twenty years. Aleamenes governed Sparta: after whom the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent Vertues, succeeded his Father, and reigned threescore years, and outlived the Messeniack War: which was ended by Theopompus, the Son of Nicander, his Royal Companion. Paus. l. 3.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet; who foretold the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the City of Ninive; which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred and fifteen years after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

ACHAS, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth year of Peka, the Son of Ramalia: the same being also the last year of his Father's Reign, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned sixteen, but not compleat years. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his Predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his Son for Sacrifice before the Idol Moloch, or Saturn, which was represented by a Man-like brazen Body, bearing the Head of a Calf, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The Children offered, were incloſed within the Carkass of this Idol, and as the Fire encreased, so the Sacrificers, with a noise of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the Air, to the end the pitiful cries of the Children might not be heard: which unnatural, cruel, and devilish Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sin was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomy, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judæa, divers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of his Æneids——Sanguine placastis, &c. and Silius,——Poscere cæde Deos. Saturn is said to have brought this Custom into Italy, besides the casting of many Souls into the River of Tiber, instead of which, Hercules commanded that the Waxen Images of Men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of Butchery, in so much that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own Children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saturn had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest Youths of their City to be slain, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed 2 Kings 16. 1. 2 Chron. 28. c. 7. 19. 32.

forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhodians, the People of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Gallatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his services: Further, as if he were not content to destroy the Souls of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devil under this fearful servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

Acost. de Hist. nat. & mor. Ind.

For the wickedness of this King Ahaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judaea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possest himself of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Jews out of it, and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judaans, of the ablest of the Kingdom, at which time Maasiah the Son of Ahaz was also slain by Zichri, with Azricham the Governour of his house: and Elcanah the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand Prisoners of Women and Children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsel of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered back again.

2 Chron. 28. 6.

As Israel and Aram vexed Juda on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistims, who evermore attended the ruin of Judaa, entred upon them from the South; and took Bethshemes, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, slew many people, and carried away many Prisoners. Whereupon when Ahaz saw himself environed on all sides, and that his Idols and dead Gods gave him no comfort, he sent to the Assyrian Tiglathpileser, to desire some aid from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the Silver and Gold both of the Temple, and Kings House.

2 Chron. 28.

2 Kings 16.

Tiglathpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father having lately made himself from a Provincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Judaea, invited by Menahem King of Israel. Wherefore now the Son willingly hearkened to Ahaz and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himself, he was content to assign some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I have said before) he was not firmly setled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in Men and Fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the Treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territory of Damascus, wan the City, and killed Rezin, the last of the Race of the Adads, who began with David and ended with this Ahaz. At Damascus Ahaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar sent to Uriah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his return he burnt sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the mean while Tiglath possest all Basan, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Ahaz, yet after the spoil of Israel, he possest himself of the greater part of Juda, and as it seemeth inforced Ahaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings the eighteenth it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and born these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth year of his Reign he died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda.

With Ahaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed forty years, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias find Anticarmus instead of this Medidus, to have been Sosarmus his Successor, to whom they give fifty years.

Euseb. in Chron.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdom of Assyria, all the Reign of Ahaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seem to have reigned with him some part of the time. For we find that Ahaz did send unto the Kings of Assur to help him. The Geneva note says, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath Pilaser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such Conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I do neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I think that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Son, who Reigned with his Father, as hath been said before: though how long he Reigned with his Father, is be hard to define.

2 Kings 28. 16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedaemon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elatus was the first, Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every year, were Controllers as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftith year of Uzzia. Alcamenon the Thirteenth of the Medontidæ, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Æschylus, and was the last of these Governours: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governours for Life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgomaster or Governour of their City for ten years.

Plut. in vita Sol.

This alteration Pausanius in his fourth Book begins in the first year of the eighth Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnassaus in the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Coroebus the first of these began his ten years Rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines governed about three hundred years by the Sylvii, of the Race of Æneas, took end the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the same King. Codoman builds it the eleventh of Ahaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I think he should, others somewhat later, and in the Reign of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others square the time of the foundation to the third year of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first year of the seventh: who seem not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Antiquities of Italy, and Foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations possest it before the arrival of Æneas, the place may seem to invite us: the rather because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder Plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers Names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the Seat, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassæus thinks to have been the first, that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus.

Halicar. l. 1.

Est locus Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glaba:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greeks Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertility.
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,
That by late ages of Posterity,
T'is from a Captain's name called Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have been, it is very uncertain. For Virgil speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the first Planters of this noble Country, Reineccius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicarnassæus, who speaks of a Colony which the Eleans did lead into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it: Secondly, upon that of Justine, who saith, that Brundusium was a Colony of the Ætolians: Thirdly, upon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa, or Tempsa a City of the Brutii in Italy: Lastly, upon the authority of Pliny, who shews that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as he shews) had one original; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common, and the Letter [o] is changed into [a]: which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an Island near Italy, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latins, as Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hereunto appertains that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greeks Cousins of the Latins. Also the common original of the Greeks and Latins from Javan; and the Fable of Janus, whose Image had two Faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italy lay, and was stamped on Coins, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, Father of the Greeks and Latins: who Sailing over the Ionian Sea, that lies between Ætolia and the Western parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one Man, and thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seem strengthened by the Marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode in Italy with Electra, the Daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the Son of Javan, and Nephew of Japheth, the eldest Son of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Country, not long before the War of Troy.

Halicarn. l. 1.

Plin. l. 3. c. 5.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus his Marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy; but calleth Electra and her Sister Maia (poetically) Daughters of the Mountain Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus been one person.

As for the authority of Berosus in this case, we need the less to regard it, for that Reineccius himself, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appears by the Verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not have said, —nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse, Ducis de nomine, gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the Country. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the War of Troy, had left in Italy a Colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italy began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldness to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I have read of any such Greek as was named Italus, yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greek Aitolus, was very famous both among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being Son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name Italus from Ætolus than Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authority stand well with the Collections of Reineccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captain, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the Reason of the Names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a Branch of them, subduing all Italy, and in few Ages whatsoever Nation was known in Europe: together with all the Western Parts of Asia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) think to have been Arcadians: and this Name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they possessed: which Title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have always usurped, fetching their Antiquity from beyond the Moon, because indeed, neither were the Inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their Seats, so oft as other Greeks were, who dwelt without that half Island, neither had the Arcadians so unsure a Dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Country was less fruitful in Land, Mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that Language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians who dwelt somewhat far from Sea, and are always noted as unapt Men to prove good Mariners, should have been Authors of new Discoveries, were a Question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of Children, in which those Ages abounded, inforceth a superfluous Company to seek another Seat, and that some Expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave Name to all Greece: but their Antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good Records. Neither was their Glory such in Italy, as could long sustain the Name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one People with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other People, did in Ages following disturb the Peace of Latium, which by Saturn was brought to some Civility, and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturn S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others term him Stercutius, and say, that he taught the People to dung their grounds. That Latium took his Name of Saturn, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionless a Fable. For as in Heathenish Superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Country or another, wherein a Man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most Fables and poetical Fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkly express (for so they feigned a passage over a River in Hell, because Death is a passage to another Life, and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painful, therefore they named the River Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because Men are stony hearted, and because the Greek λαοὶ People, and λᾶες Stones, are near in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Deucalion Stones converted into Men as at other times Men into Stones) in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturn's hiding himself was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God says, tu Deus absconditus. For it cannot be in vain that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some think) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I deny not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere. Act. 17. 23. Esa. 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the Men who gave the Name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as Aiders of the Trojans in their War. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them Subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elaa, or Elaia, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which Name last rehearsed hath a very near sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter [Δ] having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to [TH] differing only in the strength or weakness of utterance, which is found between many English Words written with the same Letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kitim, the Son of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the Names of the Mountain Eleus, the Haven Eleas, the People Elaita, the Cities Elaus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine Tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other Name than Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in Language and similitude of Names, they might nevertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the Name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which Name they had a Prince that founded the City Elateia) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Son of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the Daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia, was slain by Achilles in the Trojan War: then did Telephus, Brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what evil might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the Affairs of Troy should go ill) passed into that part of Italy, where the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother

See lib. 1. cap. 6. §. 1. & seq.

Auge,

Ange, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian Name, and to be called Elatus, which in the Dialect and Pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this Name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas; the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gave Name to the Country: and between these two Families the Succession in that Kingdom did pass, almost interchangeably for many Ages, till at the end of the Trojan War it fell into the hand of Hippothous of the Race of Elatus, in whose Posterity it continued until the last. Again, the Name Latinus, having a derivative sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an Accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the less reproof, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparent Truth, or fair Probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the Originals of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines until Æneas his coming.

THE Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Æneas, were, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturn there is nothing remembred, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be appliable to this Man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks, called by them Χρόνος, or some other, stiled Saturn by the Aborigines. For the Age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have been the same: but the Names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be this Name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the People, but rather the Soil which they laid on their Grounds, had that appellation from him) do rather make him seem some other Man.

* Ezekiel often calls the Idols of the heathen dios stercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Evangelist we read for Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus Stercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturn became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should stick unto him.

Of Picus it is said that he was a good Horseman. The Fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill he had in Sooth-saying, or Divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowls. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having slain by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the Sister of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; she was held a Prophetess, and highly commended for her Chastity; which Praise in her must needs have been much blemished by her Marriage, it self being meerly incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his Sister any Child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, save only that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his Son, by a Nymph, called Marica. Æneid. 7.

But who this Marica was it is not found, save only that her Abode was about the River Liris near Minturna.

Of the Name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the second, of whom he saith, that his Name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetii, were from his Surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Son of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a Son of the same Name. This Latinus having obtained the Succession in that Kingdom after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heir Lavinia, to Turnus the Son of Venilia, who was Sister to Amata Latinus his Wife. Suidas in the word Latini.

But when Æneas arrived in those Parts with fifteen Ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the Vessels then used, about one thousand and two hundred Men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his Assurance, to make Alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great Reputation of Æneas, which himself had heard of in the War of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former Appointment with Turnus, who incensed herewith, sought to avenge himself by War: which was soon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certain, that were she an Italian; she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas; unless we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last year of the Trojan War. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this Name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a Surname, it may seem by Varro, who calleth her Palatia: which Name very well might be derived from the Greek Name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or dear, was the Name by which the High Priest called every Virgin, whom he took to serve as a Nun of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a Surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her Sister.

Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinus, being given in Marriage to Æneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greatest part of that Country, was established in that Race: wherein it continued until it was over-grown by the Might and Greatness of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

ÆNeas himself being of the Royal Blood of Troy, had the Command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant Man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Creusa, the Daughter of Priamus, he had a Son called Ascanius; whose Surname was Iulus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) been Surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas was dead, his Wife, Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinus, being great with Child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a Son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his Father's Funeral. This Flight of Lavinia was so evil taken by the People, that Ascanius procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queeen, did foster her young Son, his half-Brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his Mother-in-Law the City Lavinium, which Æneas had built, and called after his new Wives Name, founded the City Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his Reign was, according to some, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose Contention between Sylvius, the Son of Æneas, and Julus the Son of Ascanius, about the Kingdom: but the People inclining to the Son of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his Race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose Posterity were afterward called Sylvii.

The Reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each Man's Reign, I find thus set down.

Sylvius Numitor
Ilia, called also Rhea and Sylvia
Romulus Remus

The most of these Kings lived in Peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Towns in the Borders of Latium: who standing much upon the Honour of their Original, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some think that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Æneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had Name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as Father of another Julius, and Grand-Father of Julius Proculus; who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder Son of Procas, was deprived of the Kingdom by his Brother Amulius; by whom also his Son Ægesthus was slain, and Ilia his Daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the Issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two Sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some Man of War. Both the Children their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the Mother buried quick, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestal Virgins broke their Chastity. Whether it was so, that the Mother was pardoned at the entreaty of Antho, the Daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two Children were preserved, who afterward revenged the Cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their Grand Father to the Kingdom: wherein howlong he reigned I find not, neither is it greatly material to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift encrease of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdom of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male Issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom only two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the days of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making War upon Rome, died in the Camp; and Metius Suffetius, the Successor of Cluilius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Signories to the success of three Men of each side, who decided the Quarrel by Combat: in which, the three Brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curiatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane Forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the Battel, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with Tullus; who notwithstanding this falsehood obtained the Victory, did reward Metius with a cruel Death, causing him to be tied to two Chariots, and so torn in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Cæsar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten Pedigree, in full Assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare Industry, Valour, and Judgment, obtained the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himself and his Posterity; whereby the Name of Æneas, and Honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of Glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus's Birth and Death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the Birth and Education of Romulus, the Grand-Child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering People, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in pieces by the Iron Teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having been the work of many Ages; whereof I now do handle only the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seek to derive the Romans from Janus: but Herodotus, Marsylus, and many others of equal Credit, give the Grecians for their Ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Book; Cecilius rerum Romanarum scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam à Græcis esse conditam quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto Herculi rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Roman Historiographer, doth by this Argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romans, after Greekish Fashion, by ancient Ordi- nance do ſacrifice to Hercules: the Romans alſo worſhipped the Mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the Life of Romulus remembers many Founders of that City: as Romanus the Son of Ulyſſes and Circe; Romus the Son of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from Troy, or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuſcans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus beſtows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, ſaying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others ſay, that it was anciently called Febris, after the Name of Februa, the Mother of Mars; witneſs Saint Auguſtine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the Work of Romulus, even from the Foundation: of whom and his Conſorts, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their Original, anſwered in theſe Verſes:

At tamen ut longe repetas, longeque revolvas
Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut paſtor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy Pedegree ſo far;
Thy firſt Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or elſe, that Ile forbear.

meaning either a Shepherd or a Thief.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his Education and preſervation, it is ſaid, That he had Rhea for his Mother, and Mars was ſuppoſed to be his Father; that he was nurſt by a Wolf, found and taken away by Fauſtula, a Shepherds Wife. The ſame unnatural nurſing had Cyrus, the ſame incredible Foſtering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch ſaith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with Armour to Rhea, the Mother of Romulus, when he begat her with Child: and therein it ſeemeth to me that he might have two Purpoſes; the one, to deſtroy her, becauſe ſhe was the Daughter and Heir of his elder Brother, from whom he injuriouſly held the Kingdom; the other to ſatisfie his Appetite, becauſe ſhe was fair and goodly. For ſhe being made a Nun of the Goddeſs Veſta, it was Death in her, by the Law, to break her Chaſtity. I alſo find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merovée, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monſter of the Sea: but Fauchet ſays, Let them believe it that liſt; Il le croira qui voudra: alſo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are Poetical Inventions: but to anſwer theſe Imaginations in general, it is true, that in thoſe times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or Paſſions of the Mind, or as there were of Vices and Vertues; then did many Women greatly born, cover ſuch ſlips as they made, by proteſting to be forced by more than humane Power: ſo did Oenone confeſs to Paris, that ſhe had been raviſhed by Apollo. And Anchiſes boaſted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with Child by ſome Man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of Battel, according to the ſenſe of the time. Oenone was overcome by a ſtrong Wit, and by ſuch a one as had thoſe Properties aſcribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merovée might fancy a Sea Captain to be gotten with young by ſuch a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a Baſtard and begotten upon ſome Fair Harlot, called for her Beauty Venus, and was therefore the Child of luſt, which is Venus. Romulus was nurſt by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curteſans in thoſe days were called Wolfs, qua nunc (ſaith Halicarnaſſeus) honeſtiori vocabulo amica appellantur; which are now by an honeſter name called Friends. It is alſo written, that Romulus was in the end of his Life taken up into Heaven, or rather out of the World by his Father Mars, in a great Storm of Thunder and Lightning: ſo was it ſaid that Æneas vaniſhed away by the River Numicus: but thereof Livie alſo ſpeaketh modeſtly; for he rehearſeth the other Opinion, that the ſtorm was the fury of the Senators, but ſeemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree that there was an unnatural darkneſs, both at his Birth and at his Death, and that he might be ſlain by Thunder and Lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperour Anaſtaſius was ſlain with Lightning, ſo was Strabo the Father of Pompey ſlain with a Thunder-bolt: ſo Carus the Emperour (who ſucceeded Probus) whilſt he lodged with his Army upon the River Tigris, was there ſlain with Lightning. But a Mars of the ſame kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a Man of War, and by violence deſtroyed. And that he died by violence (which deſtiny followed moſt of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the ſeventh King after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-Law, commanded that he ſhould not be buried, for (ſaid he) Romulus himſelf died and was not buried. But let Halicarnaſſeus end this diſpute: whoſe words are theſe. They (ſaith he) who draw neareſt to the Truth, ſay that he was ſlain by his own Citizens; and that his Cruelty in puniſhments of Offenders, together with his Arrogancy, were the cauſe of his ſlaughter. For it is reported that both when his Mother was raviſhed, whether by ſome Man, or by a God, the whole Body of the Sun was eclipſed, and all the Earth covered with darkneſs like unto Night, and that the ſame did happen at his death.

Fauchet, fol. 114.

Such were the Birth and Death of Romulus: whoſe Life hiſtorified by Plutarch, doth contain (beſides what is here already ſpoken of him) the conqueſt of a few Miles which had ſoon been forgotten, if the Roman Greatneſs built upon that Foundation, had not given it memory in all Ages following, even unto this day. A valiant Man he was, very ſtrong of Body, patient of Travel, and temperate in Diet, as forbearing the uſe of Wine and Delicacies: but his raging Ambition he knew not how to temper, which cauſed him to ſlay his Brother, and neglect revenge of the death of Tatius his Companion in the Kingdom, that he ſaw himſelf might be Lord alone in thoſe narrow Territories. He reigned ſeven and thirty years firſt alone, then with Tatius, and after his death ſingle, till he was ſlain, as is already ſhewed: after which time the Sovereignty fell into the hands of Numa, a Man to him unknown, and more Prieſt-like than King-like: wherein Rome it ſelf in her latter times hath ſomewhat reſembled this King. For having long been ſole Governeſs till Conſtantinople ſhared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperour was cruſhed by foreign Enemies, and the Latines deſpoiled of Imperial Power, ſhe fell into the ſubjection of a Prelate, ſwelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to exceſſive magnificence, from whence by the ſame degrees it fell, being driven from Luxury to defenſive Arms, and therein having been unfortunate, at length betakes her ſelf again to the Croſiers Staff.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occaſion of the ſtory of the times of King Ahaz, during whoſe Reign in Jewry, the Foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolemy's, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the History of the Bible.

AS the first Year of Ahaz his Reign was confounded with the last of his Father Jotham, so was the latter end of his sixteen Years taken up in the three first of Ezekias his Son. This appears by the Reign of Hosea over Israel, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia; so it follows, that Ezekia began to reign in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezekia began, and so the fifteenth year of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

2 King. 8. 13. By supposing that Hosea began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the means how to disjoyn the first of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places; it is vain labour to alter the first year.

In the fourteenth of Ezekia, Sennacherib invading Juda, and the Countries adjoyning, lost his Army by a miraculous stroke from Heaven, fled home, and was slain. The year following it was that God added fifteen years to the Life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the same year was that Miracle seen of the Sun's going back; of which wonder (as I hear) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for his skill in Astronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fifth of April, in the Julian year, being then Thursday. I have not seen any Works of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some Record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezekia is agreed upon; and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is usual in the like cases, that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, and Ezekia his Son reigned in his stead, it doth no more prove that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth infer the like at the death of Jehoshaphat, and succession of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign whilst his Father lived, we have already said enough.

2 Chro. 28. 27.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we find, that his very beginning testified his Devotion and Zeal. For whether it were so that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had out-worn his Reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the first Year and first Month of his Reign, wherein Ezekias opened the doors of the Temple, were to be understood as the beginning of his sole Government; we plainly find it to have been his first work, that he opened the Doors of the House of the Lord, which Achaz had shut up, cleansed the City and Kingdom of the Idols, restored the Priests to their Offices, and Estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had been for many years neglected, and brake down the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the People burnt Incense before it, and he called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lump of Brass. He did also celebrate the Pass-over with great Magnificence, inviting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this Feast. But the general multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekiah to scorn.

2 King. 18

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the Memorial of their deliverance out of the Ægyptian Servitude, fell into a new Servitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his Reign, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath, the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Seo King of Ægypt, against him: invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of Miseries) forced it and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Son of the same Name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve, in whose Seats and Places the Assyrians sent Strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ava, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These latter Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred Books. These therefore serve most aptly to joyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same Names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of Name hath bred question of the Persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures do speak of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekiah, Kings of Judah, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolemy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same Man. The like Reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the same, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient Proof from the exact Calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them

it appears that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six Years: at which distance of time the Reign of Salmanassar was. One great proof hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus alledgeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Hezekiah, King of Juda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, between Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Functius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the devastation of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three Years: the self same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomy seems to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty Years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, we are to understand that he took Samaria in the eighth Year of his Reign; so that the seven foregoing Years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomy's computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seven years. Now if we add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nebuchadnezzar's Years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we have the summ of one hundred and forty Years. In so plain a case more proofs are needless, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two Years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the Authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematical observations do so throughly concurr.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy Recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the Reign of Mardocempadus; the second Year of whose Reign, is, according to Ptolomy concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven Years, seventeen Days, and eleven Hours: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high noon the first day of the Ægyptian Month Thot, then answering to the twenty sixth of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Month, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Ægyptian Years. But how does this prove, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Son of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successor, or any way of his Lineage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himself did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew, than the Son of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Country-man Lydiat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, do hold up the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I have taken the pains to search, as far as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearly proving the Succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as near Succession of William the Conqueror, declares him to have been Son or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, Reigned in Babylon, and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomy are assigned to Belosus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others, that Reigned there in those Ages, and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Sennacherib.

When Salmanassar was dead, and his Son Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth Year of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-Father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanasser, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezin King of Damascus, and delivered him from the dangerous War which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, having (as it seems) a purpose to invade Ægypt, sent one part of his Army to lie before Jerusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerful Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his Peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred Talents of Silver, and thirty Talents of Gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set down before Lachis in Judæa, yet under the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver Hostages, the Assyrian environed Jerusalem with a gross Army, and having his Sword in his Hand, thought it the fittest time to write his own Conditions. 2 Kings 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Counsellers, to parly with Rabsaces, over the Wall, and to receive his demands: who used three principal arguments to perswade the people to yield themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretary, sent by Ezechias desired Rabsaces to speak unto them in the Syrian Tongue, and not in the Jewish, yet he with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude titude in their own Language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be inforced to eat their own Dung, and drink their own Urine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Ægypt, from whom the Judæans hoped for Succour, and compared him to a broken staff, on which whosoever leaneth pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the Gods who should help them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had been preserved ever since Moses's time: and withal he bad them remember the Gods of other Nations: whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown down; and for God himself, in whom they trusted, he perswaded them by no means to rely on him; for he would deceive them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerful Army, he himself left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and sought Sennacherib at Lebna in Judæa, either to inform him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to conferr with him concerning the Army of Terhaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came Letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly advised, and partly threatned to submit himself: using the same Blasphemous outrage against the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezechias, sending those Counsellers to the Prophet Esay, which had lately been sent to Rabsaces, received from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not prevail; against whom the King also besought aid from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and Blasphemous parts of Sennacherib's Letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Ashur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their Gods, for they were no Gods, but the work of Mens hands, even Wood and Stone, &c.

2 Kings 18. 21.

2 Kings 19.

The reason that moved Sennacherib to desire to possess himself in haste of Jerusalem, was that he might thereinto have retreated his Army, which was departed, as it seemeth from the Siege of Pelusium in Ægypt, for fear of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these Books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speak but of the Affairs of Jews in effect) yet the ancint Berosus, and out of him Josephus, and S. Hierom, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly do, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adjoyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Ægypt, to be Vulcan's Priest, and reporteh that the reason of Sennacherib's return from Pelusium in Ægypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bowstrings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their Weapons of that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Terhaca, remembred by Josephus, and Berosus, was the more urgent. S. Hierom upon the seven and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lie, reports Sennacherib's retreat in these words. Pugnasse autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obsedisse Pelusium, jamque extructis aggeribus, urbi capiendæ, venisse Taracham Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jerusalem centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corruisse narrat Herodotus: & plenissimè Berosus Chaldaica scriptor Historiæ quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Ægyptians, and Besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the City, Tarhacas King of the Æthiopians came to help them, and that in one night near Jerusalem one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Army perished by Pestilence, of these things (saith Hierom) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a Writer of Chaldæan story, whose credit is to be taken from their own Books. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army was in this manner. Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with Thunder and Shaking, and a great noise, a Whirle-wind and a Tempest, and a flame of devouring Fire. But Josephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, Sennacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello revertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rabsacis Imperio reliquerat peste Divinitus immissâ delectum, primâ nocte postea quam Urbem oppugnare cœperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis, centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum, qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam qua Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo post per insidias Seniorum, è filiis suis, Adramelechi, & Selennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasci; quem præcipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricidium à popularibus pulsis & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldus minor filius in Regnum successit; Sennacherib (saith Josephus) returning from the Ægyptian War, found there his Army, which he had left under the Command of Rabsaces, destroyed by a Pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begun to assault the Town: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftains and Colonels. With which destruction being terrified, and withal afraid what might become of the rest of his Army, he made great marches into his Kingdom; to his Royal City, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the Treason of two of the Eldest of his Sons, Adramelech and Selennar or Sharezer, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroch: whom he especially worshipped. These his Sons being for their Parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Asaracoldus his younger Son succeeded in the Kingdom. Who in the beginning of his Reign sent new Troops out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colony therein planted by his Grandfather Salmanassar. What this Mesroch was, it is uncertain: Hierom in his Hebrew Traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his Son had to murther him; but the most likely is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhadden. Tobit tells us, That it was fifty five days after Sennacherib's return, ere he was murthered by his Sons; during which time he slew, great numbers of the Israelites in Ninive, till the most just God turned the Sword against his own Breast.

Of Ezechias his Sickneſs and Recovery; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

After this marvellous Delivery, Ezechias ſickned, and was told by Iſaiah, that he muſt die: but after he had beſought God with Tears for his Delivery, Iſaiah as he was going from him returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promiſe him recovery after three days, and a prolongation of his life for fifteen Years. But Ezechias ſomewhat doubtful of this exceeding Grace, prayeth a ſign to confirm him: whereupon, at the Prayer of Iſaiah, the ſhadow of the Sun caſt it ſelf the contrary way, and went back ten Degrees, upon the Dyal of Achaz. The cauſe that moved Ezechias to lament (ſaith Saint Hierom) was, becauſe he had as yet no Son, and then in deſpair that the Meſſias ſhould come out of the houſe of David, or at leaſt of his Seed. His diſeaſe ſeemeth to be the Peſtilence, by the Medicin given him by the Prophet, to wit, a maſs of Figgs, laid to the Botch or Sore.

2 Kings 20.

This wonder when the Wiſe Men of Chaldæa had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the firſt of that Houſe, he ſent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cauſe: at which time Ezekias ſhewed him all the Treaſure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdom: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Iſaiah, who told him; The days are at hand, that all that is in thine Houſe, and whatſoever thy Fathers have laid up in ſtore to this day, ſhall be carried into Babel; nothing ſhall be left, ſaith the Lord. It may ſeem ſtrange, how Ezekia ſhould have got any Treaſure worth the ſhewing: for Sennacherib had robbed him of all, the Year before. But the ſpoil of the ſame Sennacherib his Camp repaid all with advantage, and made Ezekia richer upon the ſuddain than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was ſtrong temptation to boaſting. After this time Ezekia had reſt, and ſpending without noiſe that addition which God had made unto his life, he died, having Reigned nine and twenty Years. One only offenſive War he made, which was againſt the Philiſtims with good ſucceſs. Among his other Acts (ſhortly remembered in Eccleſiaſticus) he deviſed to bring Water to Jeruſalem.

Eccl. 48.

In two reſpects they ſay that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much at the deſtruction and lamentable end of his Enemy; the other, that he ſo much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to ſhew them to Strangers. But the reaſon which moved Ezekias (ſpeaking humanly) to entertain the Embaſſadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, becauſe he came to viſit him, and brought him a preſent, congratulating the recovery of his health; as alſo in that Merodach had weakened the Houſe of Sennacherib, his fearful Enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander, and Lieutenant under Sennacherib in Babylon, uſurped that State himſelf, in the laſt year of that King, and held it by ſtrong hand againſt his Son Aſſarhaddon; who was not only ſimple, but impaired in ſtrength, by the moleſtation of his Brothers. This advantage Merodach eſpied, and remembring, that their Anceſtor Phul Belochus had ſet his own Maſter Sardanapalus beſides the Cuſhion, thought it as lawful for himſelf to take the opportunity which this Kings weakneſs did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make uſe of the others wickedneſs: and ſo, finding himſelf beloved of the Babylonians, and ſufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazzard, and prevailed. The aſſertion of this Hiſtory is made by the ſame arguments that were uſed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearſe. So of this new Race, which cut aſunder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

But foraſmuch as the laſt year of Salmanaſſar was alſo the firſt of Sennacherib his Son, we reckon the time, wherein the Houſe of Phul held the Aſſyrian Kingdom, to have been an hundred and one Years; of which, the laſt five and twenty were ſpent with Ezekia, under Salmanaſſar, Sennacherib, and Aſſarhaddon.

In the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were ſo, that variety of names, by which theſe Kings were called in ſeveral Hiſtories, hath cauſed them to ſeem more than indeed they were; or whether the Sons Reigning with the Fathers, have cauſed not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion: or whether the Copies themſelves, of Cteſias and Annius his Metaſthenes, have been faulty, as neither of theſe two Authors is over-highly commended of truſtineſs: ſo it is, that the names, number, and length of Reign, are all very diverſly reported of theſe Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it need not ſeem ſtrange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as Contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile ſo great a difference, as is found in thoſe Writers that vary from Euſebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here ſet down the Roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as ſundry Authors have delivered it.

But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen upon Eusebius, who lived in an Age better furnished than ours, with Books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, Reigned in this order.

These names, and this course of Succession I retain; but add unto these, Cyaxares the Son of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings Reign, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine Years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governors of Athens for ten Years; that is of Charops, Æsimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I hear nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himself did not hear. Of the second and third I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be lockt up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any Food: so that the Horse constrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that City Romulus, did Reign both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same Age.

This Region was first called Maonia. Lydus the Son of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe such authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcæus the Son of Hercules by Jardana, a bondwoman. The race of these Heraclidæ continued Reigning fifty five Years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the Son continually succeeding the Father. Candaules the Son of Myrsus was the last of this Race, who doated so much upon the Beauty of his own Wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the Son of Dascylus, to behold her naked Body; and placed the unwilling Man secretly in her Chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with Treason. So Gyges, being brought again into the same Chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He Reigned thirty eight Years, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his Son Ardys Reigned nine and forty Years; then Sadyattes, twelve; Halyattes, fifty seven; and finally Crœsus, the Son of Halyattes, fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crœsus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which governed several Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusans: besides many great and famous, though private, Families.

But of the Heraclidæ that Reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my self to take notice in the times of their several Reigns: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Ægypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the Reign of Ezekia in Juda, when Ægypt and Juda made a League against the Assyrians.

That many names of Ægyptian Kings, found in History, are like to have belonged only to Viceroys. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his History of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdoms of Ægypt and Assyria, do require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Ægypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Country, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the mastry. Of Cham, the Son of Noah, who first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, until the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to fail in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Ægyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Ægypt, were none other than Viceroys or Stewards, such as Joseph was, and such as were the Soldans in later ages. Therefore, I will not only forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Ægyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the years of their Reigns, and other circumstances, proving them to have been Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand, to lay an imaginary ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amiss, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of History doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnify their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed only forty two descents, which makes it evident, that in far shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Ægypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, have reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Ægyptian Kings, in some even proportion, to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we find scattered here and there; any Man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth Book of the Holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himself, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Ægypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroys. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elhadech the Caliph ruled in Ægypt, one Dargan, a powerful and a subtile Man, made himself Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Almaricke King of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little loss, an Invasion, which Almaricke made upon Ægypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his party good against him, if he could get any Forces wherewith to enter Ægypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aid, who sends an Army of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victory was Dargan's, but he enjoyed it not: for in few days after, he was slain by Treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignity: which to establish he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could find in the great City of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the Administration of the Kingdom, whilst he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do nearly touch the Caliph himself. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Ægypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrival of more Company from Damasco, for the Conquest of all Ægypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expel them; much less to repel the Turkish Army, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Jerusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aid, and so drives out the Turks. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph hears nothing, or not so much, as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly, in his own Title. Syracon, Captain of the Turks, that had been in Ægypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Ægypt, each of them claiming as Heir to Mahomet, that false Prophet, the Soveraignty over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakness of the Ægyptian, with his own ability of doing service in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismatical Caliph, and the reduction of all Ægypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms; and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Ægypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his Forces he hasteth into Ægypt: well knowing how nearly it concerned him and his Kingdom of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one Head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithful care of the Christians his Friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himself in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the Enemies out of the Country. But this Victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet seems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in Title only, who medled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, upon condition, that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Ægypt, for this behoveful assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever he took upon him) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Cæsarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent unto Elhadech, to ratifie the Covenants. Now shall we see the greatness of the Caliph and his Estate.

These Embassadors were conveighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troops of Soldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, and were kept by many armed Bands of Æthiopians, which, with all diligence, did reverence unto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their Eyes. For there they saw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with Embossed works, curious Pavements, Fish-ponds of Marble with clear Waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, unknown in these parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the East-Indies, which then were undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuchs conveighed them into other Courts within these; as far excelling the former, as the former did surpass ordinary Houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of marvel; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally, they were brought into the Caliph's own Lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entring the Presence, the Soldan, having twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his Neck, and throw himself on the Ground, before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph sate. Presently the Traverse, wrought with Gold and Pearls, was opened, and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great Majesty on a Throne of Gold, having very few of his most inward Servants and Eunuchs about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters Feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger wherein the Land stood, and the offers that he had made unto King Almaricke, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Ægyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatness condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Cæsarea saw that the Caliph gave his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide it self; Princes, that will hold Covenant, must deal openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargains with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yield so far. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling chear (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the Covenants, word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatness.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great Estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his Neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royal power; making War and Peace, entertaining and expelling Armies of Strangers; yea, making the Land of Ægypt tributary to a Foreign Prince. What greater Authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee; Behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Ægypt?

I do not commend this form of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Ægyptians, ever since Joseph's time, have felt the burthen of that servitude, which he brought upon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgment good; that he affirms this manner of the Ægyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient Customs, practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomæus Lagi, and his Son Philadelphus, Founder and Establisher of that Race) were given, all of them, wholly to please their own Appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuchs, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient, to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awful regard wherein the Ægyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroys Governing Ægypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the same age; was, in few years after, Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jerusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Cæsarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Ægyptians, have honoured with that style; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make enquiry.

§. II.

§. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tomb.

IN this Business I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the Truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers, that have sought to gather the Truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this case Annius would do good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others do either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those Antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, have not been silent, and that Reineccius hath taken pains, to range into some good order the Names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, unto the Reign of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Ægyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of Reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chenchres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight Generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have been the Husband of Acencheres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited be Josephus) doth omit his Name, and insert his Wives, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his Wives Right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this Man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Ægyptian Name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two Names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my Brains in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his Monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Ægyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the People, and the triumph of the Conquerour; all this, the Ægyptians said to denote the Conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of Work, which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of Burial, to the ancient Kings and Queens of Ægypt, and to their Vice-Roys; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular Monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many Statues, therein placed, by the Wars, the Judgment-Seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the accompt of Revenues, and plenty of all Cattel and Food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the several Offices of a Governour. On the Tomb of Osymandyas was this Inscription, I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my Works. Let them, that hope to exceed his Works, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lie, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Joseph whose Body was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-lived him, erect in Honour of his high Deserts, among the Royal Sepulchres. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattel, and all manner of Viands, had good reference. The Name Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new Name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the Dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his encrease of Honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassaes are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres, (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Vice-Roy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King, as was Gehoar, Lieutenant unto Caliph Elcain, who having to his Masters use, conquered Ægypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistress, though he himself were a Dalmatian Slave. John Leo Hist. Af. ic. l. 1. & l. 8

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameses, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his Name.

WHen Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdom fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameses, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameses is that History understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the Names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Ægypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in Marriage to his Brother's fifty Sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her Husband the first Night; that only Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did save her Husband Lynceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this Fact, all the bloudy Sisters, when they died, were enjoyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessel with Water.

The Reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameses, Ægyptus; is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who caused the great Lake to be made which bears his Name. For my own part, as I can easily believe, that he which fled out of Ægypt into Greece, was a Man of such quality as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so do I not find how in so short a Reign, as five years, a Work of that Labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his Wives being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertain, and of whose Reigns we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great Works are not enough to prove them of the House of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds, or more absolute, than were those of Joseph, who bought all the People of Ægypt as bondmen, and all their Land for Bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributary; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their Reigns, whom we find to have followed one another in order of Succession: but in rehearsing the great Acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred Furlongs in compass, and fifty Fadoms deep. It served to receive the Waters of Nilus, when the over-flow being too great, was harmful to the Country; and to supply the defect, by letting out the Waters of the Lake, when the River did not rise high enough. In opening the Sluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of Waters; were spent fifty Talents; but the Lake it self defrayed that Cost; seeing the Tribute imposed upon Fish taken therein, was every day one Talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet ointments, and other ornaments for her Body. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their Statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odd months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Ramesses, his Son Amenophis held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Book.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynasty of the Larthes.

SEthosis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifty five years. To him are ascribed the famous Acts of that ancient Sesostris. But the state of the World was not such in these times, that so great an Expedition, as the old Sesostris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed, as any Man will perceive if he look upon my Chronological Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynasty of the Larthes; which Reyneccius conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being illued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Ægypt) and to have signified as much as Imperator or General. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the Æthiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Palastina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desart Sands, on the other hand, to seek matter of Conquest, in the poor Countries of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that Title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperours were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unsutable Conditions of Heliogabalus, made his Successors forbear the Name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took Name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the Government themselves; and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Vice-Roys. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the Authority of the Regents, or Vice-Roys, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the Conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Ægypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Sovereignty to himself) had under him a Vice-Roy, stiled Eddagnadare, who had Authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this Man's Family was almost as great, as the Soldan's own. Yet was there also the Amir Gabir, or Lord of the Soldan's Forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good spend of the Soldan's Treasure. So might the Office of the Vice-Roys continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the Charge, or Title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatness of that second place. As for the Names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Diospolitans, or from some eminent Men, or Man, who ruled in that time, as many think, that the seventeenth Dynasty was called of the Shepherds, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the Business which we left.

John Leo. l. 8.

Ramses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and six years. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I have spoken in the first Books. I find nothing worth rehearsal of this Ramses, or of Amenophis, and Ammenemus, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may well be, that the Name which Zethus had from Valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years; yet is he thought to have been that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his Reign, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her Restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this Business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only only are like to have had their residency about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himself into all Shapes: whereby is signified his crafty Head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptune's Seal-Fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admiral, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Son of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long Tale, fit to please Children, of his covetousness, and how his Treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a Man may believe what he lists. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he, or his Father, did reign at all.

§. V.

Of Ægyptian Kings whose Names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Ægypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other Names of Ægyptian Kings, are found scattered here and there; as Tonepherſobis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare Name and Title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senjes, or Evenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great Justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave Name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable; which I find Englished in the Translation of Plessis his Work, Of the Trueness of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

> First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
> Which three be One, and joyn in One all three:
> Whose force is endless. Get thee hence frail wight,
> The Man of Life unknown excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of Invocation which Thulis used, and that Clause, of his giving Name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of Reign. Indeed the very Name of that Book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspition of some Imposture: but the Priestly stuff that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent, that he was a Man both devout, and of good judgment, in matters that fell within his compass. I will here set down the List of old Ægyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Ægypt that he sets down is Mizraim, the Son of Cham. After him he finds many of a new Race, deriving their Pedigree thus: Nimrod, the Son of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, took upon him the Name of the Planet Saturn, had to Wife Semiramis, who was of his own Lineage, and by her three Sons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his Father out of Assyria into Italy, reigned in his stead thirty years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Juno his Sister and Wife, and to Belus his Son: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the Kingdom, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy, to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forthwith resigned the Kingdom to him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy threescore and two years, had threescore and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many Children: finally died, and lies buried in the Isle of Crete. The principal of Jupiter's Sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the Name of the Planet Mercury: he reigned in Italy, after his Father, five and thirty years: and then (finding that all his Brethren conspired against him) he went into Ægypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Ægypt four years and a half. Then Sol, the Son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus, and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their several Reigns is not set down. After Thules, was the great Sesostris King twenty years. His Successor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the Crown fifty years, with which there passed from him the Surname of Pharaoh, to a very long Posterity.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Ægypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiosity, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the Father-in-law to Salomon; and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The Name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his Reign; but we know, that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Army, took Gezer from the Canaanites, and gave it to his Daughter, Salomon's Wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his Son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides this Ægyptian Princess. In the Life of Rehoboam all hath been written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his Reign, which must have been six and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynasty.

1 King. 9. 16. & 11. vers. 18, 19, &c.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his Reign, and of theirs that followed him, unless therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the Fourth year of Jehoiakim, King of Juda, in which Pharaoh Necho was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Necho, and of his Predecessors,

ceſſors, unto the beginning of Seſac: by which accompt, the firſt year of Seſac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Solomon's Reign, and the twenty ſixth of Seſac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Seſac ſpoiled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than Joas the Iſraelite, and Craſſus the Roman did; who, after him, ſpoiled the Temple of Jeruſalem.

To fill up the time between Seſac and Necho, I have rather taken thoſe Kings that I find in the Greek Hiſtorians, than them which are in Euſebius his Catalogue. For of thoſe that are delivered by Euſebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elſewhere ſave only of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others; much being ſpoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may add, that the Succeſſion is often interrupted in Euſebius by Æthiopians, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwiſe it appears by the Prophet Eſay, that the Counſellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flouriſhing continuance of that Houſe, inſomuch, that they ſaid of Pharaoh, Iſa. 19. 11. I am the Son of the Wiſe, I am the Son of the ancient King. But that which overthrows the reckoning of Euſebius, is, the good agreement of it with his miſtaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it pleaſe him well to ſee how the Reigns of Joſias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marrs all; the Reign of Joſias being miſplaced. This Error grows from his omitting, to compare the Reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Iſrael: by which occaſion, Joram, King of Iſrael, is made to reign three years after Ahazia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanaſſar before Hezekia was King: and in a word, all, or moſt of the Kings, have their beginnings placed in ſome other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

FOllowing therefore the Greek Hiſtorians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, firſt in the rank of thoſe that were Kings after Seſac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greateſt of the three Pyramids, which was accompted one of this Worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his Name from the Shape, in that it reſembleth a flame of Fire, growing from the bottom upwards, narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being four-ſquare, had a Baſe of ſeven acres every way, and was above ſix acres high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had laſted, when Diodore ſaw it, about a thouſand years, without complaining of any injury that it had ſuffered by Weather in ſo long a ſpace. From the Reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Auguſtus Ceſar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thouſand years; which gives the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramids, late Writers teſtifie, that they have ſeen them yet ſtanding.

Diodor. l. 1. Herod. l. 2. After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his Son Chabreus ſucceeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. Theſe are ſaid to have been Brethren; but the length of their Reigns may argue the latter to have been Son to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years; Cephrenes fifty ſix. Theſe were, as Chemmis had been, builders of Pyramids, whereby they purchaſed great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themſelves in erecting the firſt. Theſe Pyramids were ordained to be Tombs, for thoſe that raiſed them; but the malice of the Ægyptians is ſaid to have caſt out their Bodies, and to have called their Monuments by the Name of an Herdſman, that kept his Beaſts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their Honour, and entituling a poor Fellow to their Works, was held to be the caſting out of their Bodies: otherwiſe it is hard to conceive, how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like ſlavery laid upon them by the younger Brother, or Son, ſhould have power or leiſure to take ſuch revenge upon his Predeceſſor. To the like malice may be aſcribed the Tale deviſed againſt Cheops his Daughter; that her Father, wanting Money, did proſtitute her, and that ſhe, getting of every Man that accompanied her, one Stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that ſtood in the midſt of the other three. Belike ſhe was an inſolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her ſake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raiſing a Monument, with the ſuperfluity of her Father's proviſions. Diod. Herod.

Mycerinus, the Son of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father ſix years. He would have built as his foregoers did, but prevented by death, finiſhed not what he had begun. The People thought him a good King, for that he did ſet open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept ſhut. But an Oracle threatned him with a ſhort Life of ſix years only, becauſe of his devotion; For (ſaid the Oracle) Ægypt ſhould have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy Predeceſſors knew, and performed for their parts, but thou haſt releaſed it, therefore ſhalt thou live but ſix years. It is very ſtrange, that the Gods ſhould be offended with a King for his Piety; or that they ſhould decree to make a Country impious, when the People were deſirous to ſerve them; or that they having ſo decreed, it ſhould lie in the power of a King, to alter Deſtiny, and make the Ordinance of the Gods to fail in taking full effect. But theſe were Ægyptian Gods. The true GOD was, doubtleſs, more offended with the reſtitution of ſuch Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows, whether Chemmis did not learn ſomewhat at Jeruſalem, in the laſt year of his Father Seſac, that made him perceive, and deliver to thoſe that followed him, the vanity of his Ægyptian Superſtition? Sure it is that his Reign, and the Reigns of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happy, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both Days and Nights, as if by keeping Candles lighted, he had changed his Nights into Days, and ſo doubled the time appointed: a ſervice more pleaſing to the Devil, than the reſtitution of Idolatry durſt then ſeem, when it could ſpeed no better. I find in Reineccius fifty years aſſigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been ſome errour of the Print, though I find it not corrected among other ſuch over-ſights: for I know no Author that gives him ſo many years, and Reineccius himſelf takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a ſhort Life, as is before ſhewed.

1 King. 14. 25. 2 Chron. 12. v. 2.

Rhampſinitus

Bocchoris is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong Man of Body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved Justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons four and forty years of his Reign.

After Bocchoris, one Sabacus an Æthiopian follows, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchoris, hath Asychis; who made a sharp Law (as it was then held) against bad Debtors, that their dead Bodies should be in the Creditors disposition, till the debt were payed. This Asychis made a Pyramis of Brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind Man, before the Æthiopian. The Reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Ægyptians, to magnifie their Antiquities, accounted between Bocchoris and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Funccius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, between them both, did govern. If any Man would lengthen this time, holding it unprobable, that the Reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Sethon or Psammeticus, and adding them to either of these: To add unto these, without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his Reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehoboam; as also the last of Pharaoh Neco was the fourth of Jehoiakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Senacherib's War: at which time Sethon was King of Ægypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these Men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Ægyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy, to leave both Asychis and Anysis out of the Roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more, (if the like abridgment shall be required of Psammeticus his Reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

1 King. 14. 25. 2 Chron. 12. 1. 2.

Of Sabacus the Æthiopian, who took the Kingdom from Amyrtis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years. He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon Malefactors; by whose toil he both got much Wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works, of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Country. Zonaras calls this King Sua, the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Ægyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Ægypt about these times; the Victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, having eaten so far into Syria, in the Reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his days (for his Reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the half subdued People, against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Senacherib's Embassador compared the Ægyptian succour to a broken Staff of Reed. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might have found it, had he not been supported by the stronger Staff of Him, that rules all Nations with a Rod of Iron. It appears by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Ægyptian Forces, for Chariots and Horse men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needful, within a little while, for the defence of Ægypt it self, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his Reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Ægyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired into Æthiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his Dreams, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his Reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he slew all the Priests in Ægypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely these Ægyptian Gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their Servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Ægyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as Gods, when their chief Gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device, of the fearful old Man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an Invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himself into Æthiopia, where he had been bred in his Youth. What if one should say, that the Æthiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this Man) raised an Army against Senacherib, when he meant to invade Ægypt, within two or three years after? But I will not trouble my self with such enquiry. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the Antiquity of Pharaoh's House) but only so surnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his Government; his holding the Kingdom so long without an Army; and many other circumstances argue no less. But whether finally he betook to a private life, or whether he forewent his Life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

2 King. 18. 24.

§. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Senacherib.

THE first year of Sethon's Reign falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fifth of Senacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdoms of Assyria and Ægypt, being then engaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine whether of them should rule or serve. The Assyrian had the better Men of War; the Ægyptian better provision of necessaries: the Assyrian more Subjects; the Ægyptian, more Friends among the new conquered half half Subjects of Assur, many that were Ægyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezekia, and his People; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharaoh, to protect them against his own great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference, between Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his especial confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Country: the Multitude of Judæa, looking into the fair hopes which this Ægyptian League promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetful of God, taking Esay 30. 1. counsel but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giving the People of Juda to understand, That the Ægyptians were men, and not God, and their horses flesh, and not Spirit; that God himself should defend Israel upon Esay 31. repentance, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but v. 3, & 8. not of man. As for the Ægyptians (said the Pro- Esay 30. 7. phet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vain, their Esay 3, 4. strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to pass. For in the Treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Chariots, that they did not look (as Esay saith) Esay 31. unto the holy one of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord. But 1. 2. he yet is wisest.

After a while came Senacherib with his Army, and wakened them out of these Dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being unready, when his help was most needful. It may seem that he purposed, rather to make Palæstina than Ægypt the Stage, whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jews, weakening one another, should yield unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with mony; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with Treasure, to Esay 30. 6. hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seems by the same place of Esay, that the rich Treasures miscarried, and fell into the Enemies hands before any help appeared from Tirhaca) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jerusalem it self, which were in sore distress, till the Sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that Esay 37. 9. is, he fled to Ninive, where he was slain.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it; That it was purposed against Ægypt, where the Men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear Arms in defence of him and the Country: that Sethon being Vulcan's Priest, bemoaned himself to his God, who by Dream promised to send him helpers: that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were Crafts-men, Shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium; and that a great Multitude of Field-mice entring the Camp of Senacherib by Night, did [illegible] Bows, Quivers, and Straps of his Men [illegible] that they were fain the next Day to flee away in haste, finding themselves disarmed. In [illegible] of (saith Herodotus) the Statue of this King was set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a [illegible] in his hand, with this Inscription: Let him, that beholds me, serve God. Such was the relation of the Ægyptian Priests, wherein how far they swerved from the Truth, being desirous to magnifie their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Jews was then well known to the World, whereof every Child could have told, how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this History agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth: That Senacherib King of the Assyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Ægypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his God now in so good a mood. For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Ægypt should have been slain, if a merciful King had not spared their lives, as it were half against the Gods Will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Ægyptians to Piety, seeing that their Devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Senacherib himself, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Ægyptian manner of expressing things) the shameful issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Army, by means which came, no Man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to Piety. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a Fable; the Devil helping to change the Truth into a lye, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belye the Devil, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himself in danger, did call upon his Gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most Devotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like Miracle? Surely the Jews (even such of them as most were given to Idolatry) would have been ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Chariots of Ægypt, because they were many, and Esay 31. 1. in the horse-men, because they were very strong; had it been told them, that Sethon, instead of sending those Horse-men and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Ægyptian Gods) addressing his Prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtless the Prophecy of Esay took effect, Esay 30. 5. which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but shall be a shame, and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure upon provision that it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have been set down by Eusebius, under the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the Reign of Sethon. These have well observed, that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Ægypt, but as a Friend to that Country, or at least an Enemy to Senacherib, in the War [illegible] last last spoken of: the Æthiopians (as they are Englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think, that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his Reign over Ægypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the first year of Manasses King of Juda. Therefore he, or his years, have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Funccius peremptorily, citing no Author, nor alledging Reason for it, sets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not careful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that Rule which I propounded unto my self at the first, for measuring the Reigns of these Ægyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Reheboam, unto the fourth of Jehoiakim, I so divide among the Ægyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of Reign is uncertain; that is upon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirty three years, that are set down by Funccius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon's Reign; therefore I conform my own Reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year less. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me; the Ægyptian Affairs growing now to be enterlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSES, and his Contemporaries.

The wickedness of MANASSES. His Imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSES, the Son of Ezekias, forgetting the Piety of his Father, and the Prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the host of Heaven, as Gods, and worshipped them: and of all his Acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sons for a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was repleni shed therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the King's race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Siloe to be sawn in sunder, with a wooden Saw, in the eightieth year of his Life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Host of the Kings of Assur, which took Manasses, and put him in Fetters, and bound him in Chains, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty years as a Captive, and despoiled of all Honour and Hope; yet to his hearty Repentance and continual Prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

2 Chron. §3. 11.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his Father Ezekias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasses to his Liberty and Estate. After which, and when he was again established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickedness, and God's great mercies towards him, he changed form, detested his former fooolish and deviliish Idolatry, and cast down the Idols of his own erection, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and died after the long Reign of fifty five years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a Case of Iron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with Bread of Bran and Water, which Men may believe as it shall please their Fancies.

§. II.

Of Troubles in Ægypt following the death of Sethon. The Reign of Psammiticus.

THat the wickedness of King Manasses was the cause of the evil, which fell upon his Kingdom and Person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled God's pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt upon Juda. For the Kingdom of Ægypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civil dissention, and after two years, ill amended by a division of the Government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their Collegues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Interregnum, or mere Anarchy, that was in Ægypt, with the division of the Kingdom following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, between the Reigns of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocracy, or twelve Governours, immediately before fore Pſammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occaſion of this diſſention ſeems to have been the uncertainty of Title to that Kingdom (for that the Crown of Ægypt paſſed by ſucceſſion of Blood, I have often ſhewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not ſettled, until one had obtained the Sovereignty.

Theſe twelve Rulers governed fifteen years, in good ſeeming agreement, which to preſerve, they made ſtrait Covenants and Alliances one with another, being jealous of their Eſtate, becauſe an Oracle had foretold, that one of them ſhould depoſe all the reſt, noting him by this Token, that he ſhould make a Drink-offering, in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper Goblet. Whilſt this Unity laſted, they joyned together in raiſing a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Mœris; a Work ſo admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirms) no words could give it commendation, anſwerable to the ſtateline's of the Work it ſelf. I will not here ſet down that unperfect Deſcription, which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to ſay, that he prefers it far before the Pyramids, one of which (as he ſaith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, or any of the faireſt Works in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have been the Work of Marus, or Menides a King which lived five Generations before Proteus, that is, before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (ſaith he) Dædalus took the Pattern of that which he made for Minos in Creet. Who this Marus or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to have been Annemenes, who reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dædalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, deſiring to accommodate the fabulous Relations of Manethon, Cheremon, and others, that are found in Joſephus, touching Amenophis and his Children, to the ſtory of Amaſis, and Abiſanes the Æthiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it conſequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Amenophis, to be Diodorus his Amaſis, that Sethon ſhould be Abiſanes, and that Annemenes ſhould be Marus. If in this caſe I might intrude a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are thoſe, about which Reineccius hath erred in making ſearch; Amaſis was Aryſis; Abiſanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of theſe twelve Princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Abiſanes the Æthiopian depoſed Amaſis; Sabacus the Æthiopian depoſed Anyſis; Abiſanes governed well, and was mild in puniſhing Offenders; ſo likewiſe was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Abiſanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (ſaving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the ſame Work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the Truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore believed the Prieſt, might be a part of the Ægyptian Vanity, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boaſting of their Antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other Circumſtances remembred by Herodotus, in ſpeaking of this Building, do help to prove, that it was the work of theſe great Princes. But I haſten to their end.

At a ſolemn Feaſt in Vulcan's Temple, when they were to make their Drink-offerings, the Prieſt, forgetting himſelf, brought forth no more than eleven Cups. Hereupon Pſammiticus, who ſtanding laſt, had not a Cup, took off his braſen Helmet, and therewith ſupplied the want. This cauſed all the reſt to remember the Oracle, and to ſuſpect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon ſet purpoſe, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being jealous of their Eſtate, they baniſhed him into the mariſh Countries by the Sea-ſide. This Oracle, and the event, is held by Diodore as a Fable, which I believe to have been none other: In the reſt Herodotus and Diodore agree, ſaying, that Pſammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whoſe aid he vanquiſhed his Companions, and made himſelf ſole King.

The years of his Reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Euſebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile theſe two, gives forty four years to his ſingle Reign, and ten to his Ruling, jointly with the Princes before ſpoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a Man grown (for he cannot in reaſon be ſuppoſed to have been then a young Fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, muſt be thought to have lived unto extream old Age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threeſcore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Euſebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Ariſtocracy: though peradventure Pſammiticus was not at firſt one of the twelve, but ſucceeded (either by Election, or as next of Blood) into the place of ſome Prince that died, and was ten years Companion in that Government.

Euſeb.

Another ſcruple there is, though not great, which troubles this Reckoning. The years of theſe Ægyptians, as we find them ſet down, are more by one, than ſerve to fill up the time, between the fifth of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Jehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we muſt abate one year from Sethon's Reign; that was of uncertain length; or elſe (which I had rather do; becauſe Functius may have followed better Authority than I know, or than himſelf alledgeth, in giving to Sethon a time ſo nearly agreeing with the Truth) we muſt confound the laſt year of one Reign, with the firſt of another. Such a ſuppoſition were not inſolent. For no Man can ſuppoſe, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are ſet down in Chronological Tables, reigned preciſely ſo many years as are aſcribed unto them, without any Fractions: it is enough to think, that the ſurpluſage of one Man's time, ſupplied the defect of another's. Wherefore I confound the laſt year of theſe fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the firſt of Pſammiticus; who ſurely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himſelf Lord alone, all in one day.

Joſ. l. 10

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the firſt in Ægypt, who entertained any ſtrait Amity with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large Rewards and Poſſeſſions; and that he greatly offended his Ægyptian Souldiers, by beſtowing them in the left Wing of his Army, whilſt his Mercenaries held the right Wing (which was the more honourable place) in an Expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this diſgrace it is ſaid, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thouſand, forſook their natural Country of Ægypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Meſſages, nor by the King himſelf, who overtook them on the way; but when he told them of their Country, their Wives, and Children, they anſwered that their their Weapons ſhould get them a Countrey, and that Nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is alſo reported of him, That he cauſed two Infants to be brought up in ſuch ſort as they might not hear any word ſpoken; by which means, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was moſt ancient; foraſmuch as it ſeemed likely, that Nature would teach the Children to ſpeak that Language, which Men ſpake at the firſt. The iſſue hereof was, that the Children cried, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to ſignifie Bread in the Phrygian Tongue, ſerved greatly to magnifie the Phrygian Antiquity. Goropius Becanus makes no ſmall matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Becker, ſignifies (as Baker in Engliſh) a maker of Bread. He that will turn over any part of Goropius his Works, may find enough of this kind, to perſwade a willing Man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs, uſed none other Tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confuſion of Languages at Babel; the Name it ſelf of Babel, being alſo Dutch, and given by occaſion of this confuſion; for that there they began to babble, and talk, one knew not what.

But I will not inſiſt upon all that is written of Pſammiticus. The moſt regardable of his Acts was the Siege of Azotus in Paleſtina, about which he ſpent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (ſaith Herodotus) that any City endured ſo long a Siege as this; yet Pſammiticus carried it at Eſai. 20. 1. the laſt. This Town of Azotus had been won by Tartan, a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it ſeemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out ſo well.

§. III.

What reference theſe Ægyptian Matters might have to the impriſonment and enlargement of Manaſſes. In what part of his Reign Manaſſes was taken Priſoner.

WEre it certainly known, in what year of his Reign Manaſſes was taken Priſoner, and how long it was before he obtained Liberty; I think we ſhould find theſe Ægyptian Troubles to have been no ſmall occaſion, both of his Captivity and Enlargement: God ſo diſpoſing of humane Actions, that even they, who intended only their own Buſineſs, fulfilled only his high Pleaſure. For either the Civil Wars in Ægypt that followed upon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were into twelve pieces, or the War between Pſammiticus and his Collegues, or the Expedition of Pſammiticus into Syria, and the Siege of Azotus might miniſter unto the Babylonian, either ſuch cauſe of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or ſuch neceſſity of ſending an Army into thoſe parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him, to make ſure work with the King of Juda. The ſame occaſions ſufficed alſo, to procure the delivery of Manaſſes, Joſ. Ant. l. 10. c. 4. after he was taken. For he was taken (as Joſephus hath it) by ſubtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Countrey, but only waſte it. So that the Jews, having learned wit, by the ill ſucceſs of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumſpect, in making their Bargain upon ſuch another Accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Ægyptian Matters preſented more weighty Arguments of Hope and Fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford,) had no reaſon, to ſpend his Forces in purſuing a ſmall Conqueſt, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he ſhould compel his mightieſt Enemies to come to ſome good Agreement; when by quitting his preſent advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Ægypt.

Now concerning the year of Manaſſes, his Reign, wherein he was taken Priſoner, or concerning his Captivity it ſelf, how long it laſted, the Scriptures are ſilent, and Joſephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three Opinions, the one of Bellarmine, who thinks that Manaſſes was taken in the fifteenth year of his Reign; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty ſeventh year; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi upon Ezekiel, who ſaith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his Repentance. The firſt of theſe Conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the ſecond, as more unprobable, and condemns the third as moſt falſe. Yet the Reaſons alledged by Torniellus in defence of the firſt, and refutation of the laſt opinion, are ſuch as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal, as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely diſſent from him) than to have uſed his accuſtomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two Arguments he brings to maintain the Opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Son of Manaſſes, is ſaid by Joſephus, to have followed the Works of his Father's Youth; the other, that had Manaſſes grown old in his ſins, it is not like that he ſhould have continued, as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of theſe Arguments, I ſee no reaſon, why the Sins of Manaſſes, might not be diſtinguiſhed from his Repentance in his old Age, by calling them Works of his Youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the ſecond; howſoever it be a fearful thing, to caſt off unto the laſt thoſe good motions unto Repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the Sins, which are not forſaken before the age of two and fifty years, ſhall be puniſhed with final impenitency. But againſt theſe two Collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manaſſes continued longer in this wickedneſs, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the ſecond Book of Kings, the evil which Manaſſes did is remembred at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; ſo that his amendment may ſeem to have taken up no great part of his Life, the ſtory of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the reſt of the Acts of Manaſſes, and all that he did, and his ſin that he ſinned, are they not written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda. 2 Kings 21. 17.
The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the ſame Book, where in rehearſing the Calamities, with which that Nation was puniſhed in the time of Jehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manaſſes, it is ſaid; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his ſight, for the ſins of Manaſſe, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he ſhed (for he filled Jeruſalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. 2 Kings 24. 3, 4. Whoſo conſiders well theſe places, may find ſmall cauſe to pronounce it moſt falſe, That the repentance and amendment of Manaſſes was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or moſt probable, That when he was twenty ſeven years old, he repented, and becoming a new Man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two years of civil dissention in Egypt, fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdom was weakened, by partition of the Sovereignty; the War of Psammiticus against his Associates; and four and twenty years, of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leave no one part of his Reign (after the first fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose Men of War had continual occasions of visiting his Country. All which I will add hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses, was the last year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his Reign, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the fifth of Nabulassar, the Son of Merodach in Babylon: but which of these was the year of imprisonment, or whether any other, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seem to draw all matters over violently to mine own computation.

This was the first great mastery that the Babylonians had of the Kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezekias never payed it. True it is, that he hoped to 2 King. 18. stay Sennacherib's Enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred Talents of Silver, and thirty of Gold, besides the Plate which covered the doors and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater Necessity, could refuse no tolerable Conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of Servitude) that he might not hold Peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were Enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with Men of War all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose Party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more Controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharaoh Necco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all Reason and Policy, if it had not been his Duty by Covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the Reigns of Ezekia, and Manasses Kings of Juda.

NOW concerning such Actions as were performed abroad in the World, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happening in this Age, and being the greatest Action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the days of Ezekia; the second in the Reign of Manasses: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our History, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needless, than to say, that the Posterity of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops, and the Achæans, out of their Seats, divided their Lands between themselves, and erected the Kingdoms of Lacedæmon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and sought one another's ruine with bloudy Wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian War are scarce worth remembrance; they were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it; wherewith the Lacedæmonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slain many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euphaes a Lacedæmonian. This Euphaes had bargained to give Pasture to the Cattel of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattel, and Slaves that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a fair Tale to his Friend, saying, that they were stollen. Whilst the Lye was yet scarce out of his mouth; one of the Slaves that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive, he carried the Son of Polychares home with him, but having him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedæmonians having refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father; to do him right against this Thief and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of Quarrel out of those things, which he did in that madness, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand unto the Judgment of the Amphictyones, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupy the fair Country of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such Allegations. They thought it enough, to have some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old Injuries, and so without sending any Defiance, secretly took an Oath, to hold War with Messene, till they had mastered it: which done, they seized upon Amphia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Messenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious Battel was fought between them, which ended not until dark Night, with uncertain Victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedæmonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two Enemy Nations tried the Matter, for a while with their proper Forces; the Lacedæmonians wasting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere Friends on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, took part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth Battel were fought, with as great obstinacy as the first; saving that, in the fourth Battel, the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other Fights, the Victory was still uncertain, though though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent, ere all this Blood was shed; for pestilent Diseases, and want of Money to entertain Souldiers, caused the War to linger. And for the same Reasons, did the Messenians, forsake all their inland Towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more, than the Enemies were likely to do. But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their Vow, that having absented themselves ten years from Sparta, their Wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young Men, promiscuously to accompany the young Women, who got so many of them with Child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus referrs the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in process of this Messenian War, when the Devil in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to Sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of * Ægytus, that so they might be Victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the Lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibelus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was only a fostered Child, and not born of the Wife of Lyciscus: which Answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Noble Man, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had deflowred her, and got her with Child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughter's Belly, to disprove the Lover's slander: at the Grave of which Daughter of his, afterward falling by other Superstitions into despair of prevailing against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himself, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their Courage, and finding themselves distressed by many Wants, especially of Victuals, they craved Peace, which they obtained under most rigorous Conditions. Half the yearly Fruits of their Land they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn Lamentations, at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true subjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was given to the Asmni, and such as had followed the Spartans in this War.

Strabo. l. 6. Orof. l. 1. cap. 21.

* This Ægytus was the youngest Son of Cyssius by Amyne, the Daughter of Cyssius, King of Arcadia: of which Cyssius the chief Nobility of the Messenians was propagated.

This Peace being made upon so uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious War, than the former. The able young Men, that were grown up in the Room of those Messenians, whom the former War had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equal to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorning to serve such Masters, as had against all Right, oppressed their Fathers. The chief of these was Aristomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the House of Ægytus; who perceiving the uniform Desires of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore sounding the Affections of the Argives, and Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his Purpose, began open War upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad, when the Lacedæmonians, hasted to quench the Fire before it should grow too hot, with such Forces as they could raise of their own own, without troubling their Friends, to deal with their Enemies, ere any Succour were lent them. So a strong Battel was fought between them, and a doubtful; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to think them their Equals. Particularly, the Valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this Fight, that his People would have made him their King: but he, refusing the Honour of that Name, accepted of the Burthen, and became their General. Within one year another Battel was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other Friends to help: the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudy Fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himself, that finally he made the Enemies run for their Lives. Of such importance was this Victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethink themselves, of making some good Agreement. But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in Fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him, in hope to have recovered the Booty.

But all these Victories of Aristomenes perished in the loss of one Battel, whereof the Honour (if it were Honour) or surely the Profit, fell unto the Lacedæmonians, through the Treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the Enemies with Money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruel Butchery. The loss was so great, that all Andania their principal City, and the Towns in Messene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned, and for lack of Men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed, as into a place of safety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it self was a strong piece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers did many incredible Exploits that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the Siege. He wasted all the Fields of Messene, that were in the Enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all Provisions, necessary for his own People; the Slaves and Houshold-stuff he changed into Money, suffering the Owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their own Country, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private Men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this Uproar with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the Fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amycle, and finally caused the Enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other Services, thrice Aristomenes was taken Prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembred, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that Fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senseless, and carried away Prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans uſed to caſt head-long, ſuch as were condemned to die for the greateſt Offences. To this puniſhment were Ariſtomenes and his Companions adjudged. All the reſt of theſe poor Men died with their falls; Ariſtomenes (howſoever it came to paſs) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be impriſoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead Carcaſſes, where he was like to periſh through hunger and ſtench. But after a while he perceived by ſome ſmall glimmering of Light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead Body. Hereupon he bethought himſelf, that this Beaſt muſt needs know ſome way, to enter the place and get out. For which cauſe he made ſhift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the Tail with one hand, ſaved himſelf from biting with the other hand, by thruſting his Coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his Guide, until the way was too ſtrait for him; and then diſmiſſed it. The Fox being looſe, ran through a hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Ariſtomenes delve ſo long with his Nails, that at laſt he clawed out his paſſage. When ſome Fugitives of Meſſene brought word to Sparta, that Ariſtomenes was returned home, their Tale ſounded alike, as if they had ſaid, that a dead Man was revived. But when the Corinthian Forces, that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the Siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains ſlain, and their Camp taken; then was it eaſily believed, that Ariſtomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years paſſed whilſt the Enemies hovering about Era, ſaw no likelihood of getting it; and Ariſtomenes with ſmall Forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the laſt, a Slave, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This Fellow had enticed to lewdneſs the Wife of a Meſſenian, and was entertained by her, when her Husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainy-winter-night, that the Huſband came home unlooked for, whilſt the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her Husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned ſo ſoon. He told her, that the ſtorm of foul weather was ſuch, as had made all his Fellows leave their Stations, and that himſelf had done as the reſt did; as for Ariſtomenes, he was wounded of late in Fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the Enemies would ſtir, in ſuch a dark-rainy-night, as this was. The Slave that heard theſe tidings, roſe up ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with the News. There he found Emperamus his Maſter, commanding in the King's abſence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that Night. For the Alarm was preſently taken; and the extreme darkneſs, together with the noiſe of Wind and Rain, hindered all Directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruel Fight; one part being incited, by near hope of ending a long work; the other inraged by meer deſperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenſed partly by the aſſiſtance, which Women and Children (to whom the hatred of ſervitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their Husbands and Fathers; partly by the narrowneſs of the Streets and other Paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continual toil; their Enemies fought in courſe refreſhing themſelves with Meat and Sleep, and then returning ſupplied the places of their weary Fellows, with freſh Companies. Ariſtomenes therefore, perceiving that his Men, for want of Relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days, and three nights, vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger, and thirſt, beſides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker ſort, whom he compaſſed round with armed Men, and ſo attempted to break out through the midſt of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair paſſage to theſe deſperate mad-men. So they iſſued forth, and arrived ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt lovingly entertained.

Upon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelves to the reſcue: but Ariſtocrates their falſe hearted King, ſaid it was too late, for that all was already loſt. When Ariſtomenes had placed his followers in ſafety, he choſe out five hundred the luſtieſt of his Men, with whom he reſolved to march in all ſecret haſte to Sparta, hoping to find the Town ſecure, and ill manured, the people being run forth to the Spoil of Meſſene. In this Enterpriſe, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyn with him; but Ariſtocrates marred all, by ſending ſpeedy Advertiſement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiſtle which Anaxander ſent back to Ariſtocrates, was intercepted, by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſehood, which being publiſhed in open aſſembly, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting forth his Body unburied, erected a Monument of his Treachery, with a Note, That the Perjurer cannot deceive God.

Of Ariſtomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his People to the charge of his Son Gorgus and other ſufficient Governours, who ſhould plant them in ſome new Seat abroad, he reſolved himſelf to make abode in thoſe parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians work at home. His Daughters he beſtowed honourably in Marriage. One of them Demagetus who reigned in the Iſle of Rhodes took to Wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the Daughter of the beſt Man in Greece. Finally Ariſtomenes went with his Daughter to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to have travelled unto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but Death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were invited by Anaxilas (whoſe great Grandfather was a Meſſenian and went into Italy after the former War) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italy, to take his part againſt the Zanclæans in Sicily, on the other ſide of the Straits. They did ſo; and winning the Town of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which Name it keeps to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian War ended in the firſt year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the reſt of that Nation, who ſtaying at home ſerved the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebell; but were ſoon vanquiſhed, and being driven to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few Ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed lowed their ancient Countrimen into Italy and Sicily; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a Seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourscore years, this banished Nation retained their Name, their ancient Customs, Language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country, with a desire to return to it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old Possession, and help them in building a fair City; which, by the name of the Province, was called Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media. Whether Dejoces were that King Arphaxad mentioned in the History of Judith.

WHile Manasses reigned. Whether Dejoces the Mede were that King Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the History of Judith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian War. Ardys succeeding unto his Father Gyges, began his Reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his Father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his Reign, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own Country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this Man's Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but wan the City of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadel thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long Reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian War ended; the same being the last year of Manasses his Reign over Juda.

Dejoces the Father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these five and fifty years in which Manasses reigned. This Dejoces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict Form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessors had done. For they following the example of Arbaces, had given to the People so much Licence, as caused every one to desire the wholesom severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Dejoces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard, for defence of his Person; he seldom gave presence, which also when he did, it was with such Austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like Ceremonies he bred in the People an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majesty, which his Predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due Comportments. In execution of his Royal Office, he did uprightly and severely administer Justice, keeping secret Spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the Bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others; but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Dejoces was the first who reigned in Media. Herod. l. 1.

This was he that built the great City of Echatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the Story of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same accompt, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holophernes sent to work wonders, upon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Dejoces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the Reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this Book of Judith to a certain time, there hath much labour been spent, with ill success. The Reigns of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this Age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the Story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as fain would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the Story of Judith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose Judgment the Authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this Argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the Matter to the Reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the Business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from Captivity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long Peace, of threescore and ten years or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded, all Temples of such as were accounted gods to be destroyed; one whose Vice-Roy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were, of the bordering People.

Of all these Circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from Captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long Peace following, agree with the Reign of Xerxes; the rest of Circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captivity of the Jews and desolation of the City. Wherefore the brief decision of this Controversie is, that the Book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Dejoces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army which he sent forth under Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances, rehearsed before be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jewry were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief, from this conjecture: and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebel, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand Men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Archers on Horseback, as to think that he might do what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity, of holding the Book of Judith, to be Canonical, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they also do, the Text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Reign of Manasses, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were, to break through a Wall, in saying that the Text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Torniellus, are the Children of meer fantasie, it is so plain, that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this History, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, extra anni solisque vias, in an Age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Judith c. 2. vers. 23. & 25. Surely to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question had done Chronologers. But I will not busie my self herewith; having already so far digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first year of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen; a peaceable Man and seeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good Civility, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his own judgment, no better than meer delusions, that served only as rudiments, to bring the Savage multitude of Thieves and Out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boysterous and wild natures was otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his Grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His Grave was opened by chance; in digging a piece of Ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of Stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine Letters, which said that Numa Pompilius the Son of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own Constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophy. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Prætor of the City desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn Oath, that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquit himself, unto wiser Ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so fooliſh as to believe the Doctrine wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when he sat in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his Grave. Had these Books not come to light, until the days of Tully and Cæsar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not only escaped the Fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa Reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and Reigned two and thirty years, busied, for the most part in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the Field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thuscanes, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common Enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins born at one Birth (Dionysius says that they were Cousin Germans) of equal years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their several Countries. The end was that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans got the Victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts could not follow him with equal speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, Man after Man, ere they could joyn together and set upon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slain, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediatly become subject unto her own Colony, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governor, utterly razed, the People being removed unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latins, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) until such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Governors for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only the names, Leocrates, Apsander, and Erixias. After Erixias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governors for ten years, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of Rule was shortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely, that they would Govern the better, when they knew, that they were afterwards to live private Men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first year of Charops his Government in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner. Dion. Halic. l. 1. fol. 43. & 44.

In the Reign of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets feigned to have had Asses Ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many Fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his Meat and Drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from his miserable faculty, by causing him to wash himself in the River Pactolus, the Stream whereof hath ever since forsooth, abounded in that precious Metal. Finally it is said, he dyed by drinking Bulls Blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the Life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the Foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians, having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the Coast of Ægypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Ægypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus, nor Athens, were now of power sufficient, to plant a Colony in Ægypt by force.

About this time Archias with his Companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuse in Sicily: a City in after-times exceeding famous. Plut. & Eusb.

The City of Nicomedia, sometime † Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Zipartes Native of Thrace. Sibylla of Samus according to Pausanias lived about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the Companion of Archias that built Syracuse: Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanius.

About the same time, the Parthenians, being of age, and banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy, where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. Also about the same time, Manasse yet living, the City Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbri, now called Urbin in Italy. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, over-against Byzantium, (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manasses: that which hath already been told is enough: the rest, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them. *Strabo l. 6. AMMON the Son of Manasse, a Man no less wicked than was his Father before his Conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which
2 King. 21. 2 Chron. 33. God hardened the hearts of his own Servants against him: who slew him after he had reigned two years: Philo, Eusebius and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a Child of eight years old. He began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year
2 King. 22. 2 Chron. 34. he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his sight the Altars of Baalim. He caused all the Images, as well those which were Graven, as Molten, to be stampt to Powder, and strewed on their Graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was propheſied, in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a Child should be born unto the House of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet speak-
1 King. 13. ing to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee. A Prophecy very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his Reign, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Book of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe Commandments therein written, the prosperity promis'd to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his Garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask Counsel of the Propheteſs Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the Messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, behold
2 Chron. 34. 24. I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and burnt incense to other Gods. Only for the King himself, because
2 King. 22. 15. 2 Chron. 34. he was a lover of God and of his Laws, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his days, but that he himself should inherit his Grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a Covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to do the like, promising thereby to observe the Laws and Commandments in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and Bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any Victory of Josias in War got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himself against Asarhaddon, did use the advantage which the Faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdom of Israel, as he was able to People. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himself unable to deal with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the Siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty as much in Israel, as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Ægypt, by casting a Bone between them, and withal by this benefit of enlarging their Territory with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of war 2 Chron. 33. 14. in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himself against the Ægyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions, only for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrel, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly terms, as required not only a faithful observation, but a thankful requital. For no perswasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharaoh Neco King of Ægypt passed along by him, to War upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last year of Josias his Reign it was, when as Neco the Son of Psammiticus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Judea, determining to pass that way being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages 2 Chron. of that River, about Carcemish or Cercusium, for 35. 20. the defence of Syria (as long after this; Diocletian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done) or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travel of Psammiticus had not been idlely consumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Ægyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged unto the Adads Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industry of Neco less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing the War against Babel. In which War, two things may greatly have availed the Ægyptians, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Ægypt could of it self afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better; and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the War; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Ægypt, into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharaoh Neco ascended with a mighty Army.

Ægypt

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid way between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country; Now though it were so that Neco himself desired by his Embassadors, 2 Chron. 35. leave to pass along by Judæa, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrians only, without all harmful purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Ægypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Ægypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his Life and Estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezekia, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Ægyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were always unready; when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek, to have the Jews renew there ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did soon after this out-face Nabulassar, upon his own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawful excuse of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe, that this religious and vertuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in Faith and Honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdom was obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Ægyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their Enemy.

Some think, that this action of Josias, was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I do not find in the Prophecy of Jeremy, nor can find reason to believe. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to ask the counsel of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might believe that an enterprise grounded upon fidelity and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionless far from hearkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half Tribe of Manasses, encountred Neco: and there he received the stroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His loss was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremy the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowful remembrance thereof into his Book of Lamentations. Lament. 4. vers. 20.

§. II.

Of Pharaoh Neco, that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim Kings of Juda.

OF these Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention, among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might pass, out of Nilus into the Red-sea. It should have reached above a hundred Miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the midst of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when half was done. There were consumed in this toilsome business twelve hundred thousand Ægyptians; a loss great enough to make the King forsake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were he was not a Man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he used the service, as well of his Navy, as of his Land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found Recorded, save only this Victory against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Jews Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judæa was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have been the same place (though diversly named) in which this battel was fought. After this, Necus took the City of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josephus witnesseth. Joseph. Ant. Jud. l. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting sail from the Gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed Corn for their sustenance, in that long Voyage which lasted three years. This was the first navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good Hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, untill Vasco de Gama the Portingal found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by Herod. l. 4.

the Pillars and Streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the Straights of Gibraltar, having Africk ſtill on the right hand: but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not far from the ſame Straights, leave Africk on the Larboard, and bend their courſe unto the Eaſt. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durſt not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the Northſide of them, is a matter of neceſſary truth; and the obſervation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that ſuch a Voyage was indeed performed.

But leaving theſe Diſcourſes of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his Eſtate. The people of Juda, while the Ægyptians were buſie at Carchemiſh, had made Jehohaz their King, in the room of his Father Joſias. Jer. c. 22. v. 32. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger Brother; alluding perhaps to the ſhort Reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Iſrael Reigned but one month; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldeſt Son of Joſias: Wherefore it may ſeem that he was ſet up as the beſt affected unto the King of Babel; the reſt of his houſe being more 2 King. c. 34. v. 32. inclined to the Ægyptian, as appears by the ſequel. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had diſpatched his buſineſs in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judæa. This Country was now ſo far from making any reſiſtance, that the King himſelf came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went ſo ill on his ſide, that Neco did caſt him into Bonds and carry him priſoner into Ægypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder Brother, to whom of right it did belong. This City of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be obſerved in divers examples. Yet here Jehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom, an ill gain ſince he could no better uſe it. But however Jehoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharaoh ſped well, making that Kingdom, Tributary, without any ſtroke ſtricken, which three Months before was too ſtout to give him peace, when he deſired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to waſt his forces upon Judah: but now the reputation of his good ſucceſs at Megiddo, and Carchemiſh, together with the diſſenſion of the Princes Joſias his Sons (of whom the eldeſt is probably thought to have ſtormed at the preferment of his younger Brother) gave him power to do even what ſhould pleaſe himſelf. Yet he did forbear to make a Conqueſt of the Land; perhaps upon the ſame reaſon which had made him ſo earneſt in ſeeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had ſuffered much, in the Ægyptians quarrel, and being left by theſe their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven to forſake that party and joyn with the enemies; to whom if they ſhewed themſelves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; ſeeing they were ſuch a people, as would not upon every occaſion ſhift ſide, but endure more, than Pharaoh, in the pride of his Victories, thought that any hereafter ſhould lay upon them: ſo good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheleſs he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of Silver, and one Talent of Gold; that ſo he might both reap at the preſent, ſome fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them ſome document in the future, of greater puniſhment than verbal anger, due to them, if they ſhould rebel. So he departed carrying along with him into Ægypt the unfortunate King Jehoahaz, who died in his Captivity.

The Reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers laſt years, otherwiſe it would hardly be found, that Jehoiakim his ſucceſſor did Reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that is current and incompleat. If any Man will rather caſt the three Months of this ſhort Reign, into the firſt year of the Brother, than into the Fathers laſt; the ſame Arguments that ſhall maintain his opinion, will alſo prove the matter to be unworthy of Diſputation; and ſo I leave it.

Jehoiakim in Impiety was like his Brother, in Faction he was altogether Ægyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharaoh. The wickedneſs of theſe laſt Kings, being expreſſed in Scriptures none otherwiſe than by general words, with reverence to all the evil that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyſon wherewith Ahaz and Manaſſes had infected the Land was not ſo expelled by the zealous goodneſs of Joſias, but that it ſtill cleaved unto the chief of the people, Yea unto the chief of the Prieſts alſo; and therefore it was not ſtrange that the Kings had their part therein. 2 Chron. cap. 36. verſ. 14. The Royal authority was much abaſed by the dangers wherein the Country ſtood, in this troubleſome Age: the Princes did in a manner what they liſted; neither would the Kings forbear to proſeſs, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehoiakim had the countenance of the Ægyptian to grace it, which made him inſolent and cruel; as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein alſo the Princes do appear to have been inſtigators. This holy Man denounced Gods judgments againſt the City, and Temple, in like ſort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the ſame Age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to Death. Hereupon the poor Man fled into Ægypt: but ſuch regard was had unto Jehoiakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embaſſador, and ſent back to the Death; contrary to the cuſtom uſed, both in thoſe days and ſince among all Civil Nations of giving refuge unto Strangers, that are not held guilty of ſuch inhumane Crimes, as for the general good of mankind ſhould be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Pharaoh to give all contentment poſſible to Jehoiakim; for the Aſſyrian Lion that had not ſtirred in many years, began about theſe times, to roar ſo loud upon the Banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning to make himſelf Lord of all the Foreſt. The cauſes that hitherto had withdrawn the houſe of Merodach from oppoſing the Ægyptian in his Conqueſts of Syria, require our conſideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemiſh, where ſhortly after this, the glory of Ægypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to paſs that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their buſineſs in Syria; which cauſed them to loſe that Province.

Merodach the Son of Baladan who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's miſadventure and death, together with the diſſention between his Children Children presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy Asarhaddon the Son of Sennacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Ninevie; from whom whilst he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all business in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly but less probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians I will not here stand to enquire: his long Reign following, and his little intermedling in matters of Syria make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Josephus gives him the honour of having won Ninevie it self; which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soon following, that great City was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Assyrian King whose Captains took Manasses Prisoner; but I rather believe those that told the contrary; for which I have given my reasons in due place: To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jews were his Friends, and the Ægyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was until the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his Son.

Ben Merodach the Son and successor of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years, for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known summ) deducting the years of his Father, and of his Son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alledged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater business in his own Kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad: insomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-sight of Psammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Ninevie; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of Scythians, who in these ages did over-flow those parts of the World, laying hold upon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the Son of Dejoces, King of the Medes, having by many Victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Ninevie.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereign Lady was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her self she was well enough. Herod. lib. 1.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this Imperial Seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the means to set it self at liberty: as after this again it did appear, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp War, and the very novelty of suddain violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custom of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Ninevie had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted all the fury, wherewith either Domestical tumults between the Sons of Sennacherib, or Foreign War of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the less wonderful, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journy against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he undervalued their Forces, and brought a less power than was needful.) It is enough, that we may herein believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the Son of Phraortes, a braver Man of War than his Father, wan as much of Asia the less, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he sought revenge upon the Assyrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Ninevie it self, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, that he took the City and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came upon him whilst he lay before it. For where equal Authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors, that are now lost, is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Ninevie, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Soldier. But to suppose that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such business as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times; of which Book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nahum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final destruction of Ninevie by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Ægypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more Authority, than the reformed Churches yield, to the Book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of necessity, to affirm, that about these times Ninevie was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the Victory over it, to Ben Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the Son of Ben Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such ſuch time as the Country of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out ready to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Ninivites were allaied, and their malice to Babylon ſo aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confuſion, this unthankful People and their King, rebelled again, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonoſor.

§. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twenty years.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I have ſhewed, what impediment was given by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled, to perform any action of worth upon the Ægyptians in Syria: it is time that I ſpeak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in ſuch wiſe that part of the trouble redounded even to the Ægyptians themſelves. Of the Scythian People in general, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſs to recite them, for they are far enough diſtant from the buſineſs in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may ſeem very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeem to make my ſelf too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or elſe to be too forgetful of my ſelf, in bringing to act upon the Stage, thoſe Perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years he ſaith that the Scythians reigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War, between Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the Siege of Ninivie; the Siege of Ninivie being ere the Scythians came. And further he tells, how the Scythians, having vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſs into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Ægypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. Theſe Narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in ſuch order of time as he hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to Reign: and Cyaxares had ſpent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; ſo that he could not, after thoſe Lydian Wars, Reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the Son of Pharaoh Neco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Euſebius himſelf refers all that buſineſs of the Scythian irruption into Paleſtina, to Pſammiticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwiſe than to believe him, that ſuch things were in theſe ages, though not in ſuch order as he ſets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, thoſe Memorials which I find of this expedition ſcattered in divers places: a work neceſſary, for that the greatneſs of this action was ſuch, as ought not to be omitted in a general Hiſtory; yet not eaſie, the conſent of thoſe that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the Reign of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians over-ran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the uper hand of them. In theſe times therefore of Ardys, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Aſia. Now foraſmuch as Pſammiticus the Ægyptian had ſome dealings with the Scythians, even in the heighth of their proſperity, we muſt needs allow more than one or two of his laſt years, unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Pſammiticus, leaves the ſpace very ſcant, either for the great Victories of the Scythians, neceſſarily ſuppoſed before they could meet the Ægyptian in Syria, or for thoſe many loſſes, which they muſt have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increaſe this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchodonoſor in Babylon, is of no ſmall moment. For how may we think it poſſible, that he ſhould have adventured the ſtrength of his Kingdom againſt the Ægyptians and Jews, had he ſtood in daily fear of loſing his own; to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his Neck? To ſpeak ſimply as it appears to me; the Victories aſcribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over theſe warlike People, were not obtained againſt the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of ſome Troops, that infeſted their ſeveral Kingdoms; other Princes, and among theſe, Nabulaſſar having the like ſucceſs, when the pleaſures of Aſia had mollified the outrages of theſe hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians Rule, to as many almoſt the laſt of Nabulaſſar's Reign, in compaſs whereof their power was at the greateſt. This is all that I can ſay of the time, wherein Aſia ſuffered the violence of theſe Oppreſſors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Aſia; with the cauſe of their journy.

TOuching the expedition it ſelf, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and waſted ſome part of Aſia; and that the Scythians not contented with having won the Land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, ſo (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Ægypt, in this purſuit of Men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and baſe People; the Scythians, as miſchievous and fooliſh; or elſe Herodotus, and ſome other of his Country Men, great ſlanderers of thoſe, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievouſly ranſackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is ſo well known, and their many Conqueſts

ſo well teſtified in Hiſtories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is inſufficient to ſtain them with the note of Cowards. Theſe were the poſterity of Gomer, who peopled the greateſt part of our Weſtern World; and whoſe re-flow did overwhelm no ſmall portion of Greece and Aſia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely inform himſelf of their Original and Actions, may peruſe Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is ſaid to have ſpoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is eaſie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by ſuch Arguments and Authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Lineage and Nation; howſoever diſtinguiſhed in name, by reaſon of their divers Tribes, Profeſſions, or perhaps Dialect of Speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whoſe Country whether he place in the Weſt, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with Eternal darkneſs; certain it is that he would have them near Neighbors to Hell: for he had the ſame quarrel to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them ſeem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his Life affirms) to inſert into his Works the names of ſuch as lived in his own times, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelf deſerved. And for this reaſon it is proved by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Country. Perhaps, that Invaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his Diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to have happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Aſia; which though it be not in expreſs terms written, that they did with joynt Forces, yet ſeeing they invaded the ſelf-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were Companions. One journy of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the Streights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them aſſiſtance. The ſame Author, before his entry into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelf acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no leſs Warlike than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen, who is ſaid to have ſlain the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them to the Wars; and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe Women; the terrible deſcent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof ſufficient. I will not here enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; other place will give me better leiſure to ſpeak of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by divers Hiſtorians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may the better approve Goropius his concluſion, That theſe three Nations were one, at leaſt that they were near Allies.

Diod. lib. 2. c. 11.

Now concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the ſending a Colony of them forth into Aſia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchaſing a new Seat, and eſtabliſhing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were Companions in this journy. For the City of Novograd in Ruſſia (which Country is the ſame that was called Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon be further ſhewed. So that all the North was up in Arms: and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame People made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the Lake Meotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their Neighbors; they had in their Army above three hundred thouſand fighting Men, beſides a huge Multitude of Women and Children; they wandered over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have ſetled themſelves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible Battels by the Roman Conſuls. Mere neceſſity enforced theſe poor Nations, to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard adventures. For their Country, being more fruitful of Men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut up on the North-ſide with intolerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their overſwelling Multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of poſſeſſion, as having title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, People had. Their ſturdy Bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardneſs, gave them great advantage over ſuch as were accuſtomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore commonly they prevailed very far; their next Neighbours giving them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be rid of them; others giving them, beſides paſſage, Victuals and Guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleaſant Lands they found, and the more effeminate People.

Plutarch in the Life of Marius.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians War in Lydia.

THE firſt Company of theſe, conſiſting for the moſt part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had ſtill on the right hand; leaving on the other ſide, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucaſus. Theſe having paſſed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory whereon Sinope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it ſeems that they beſtowed the weakeſt and moſt unſerviceable of their Train, together with the heavieſt part of their Carriages, under ſome good Guard: as drawing near to thoſe Regions, in Conqueſt whereof they were to try the utmoſt hazard. For in like ſort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I ſpake even now) diſpoſe of their impediments, leaving them in a place of ſtrength, where Antwerp now ſtands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themſelves in the purchace. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountains or any deep deep Rivers to ſtay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already paſſed.

What Battels were fought between theſe Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable ſucceſs the one or other part wan and loſt, I find not written nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got poſſeſſion of Sardes the Capital City of Lydia; only the Caſtle holding out againſt them. Further I obſerve, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this Invaſion, and by Halyattes and Cræſus in the times following; all that Ardys did againſt the Cimmerians, and all, ſave burning the Mileſians Corn-fields, that was done in twelve years by Sardiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands ſo full of this buſineſs, that he could turn them to nothing elſe) is quite omitted: whereby it may ſeem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in thoſe Wars, but were glad enough that they did not loſe all.

Certainly, the Miſeries of War are never ſo bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forſaking their own Seats, labours to root out the eſtabliſhed poſſeſſors of another Land, making room for themſelves, their Wives and Children. They that fight for the maſtery are pacified with Tribute, or with ſome other ſervices and acknowledgments, which had they been yielded at the firſt, all had been quiet, and no Sword bloodied. But in theſe migrations, the Aſſailants bring ſo little with them, that they need all which the Defendants have, their Lands and Cattle, their Houſes and their Goods, even to the Cradles of the ſucking Infants. The mercileſs terms of this controverſie arm both ſides with deſperate reſolution: ſeeing the one part muſt either win, or periſh by Famine; the other defend their Goods, or loſe their lives without redemption. Moſt of the Countries in Europe have felt examples hereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by ſuch Invaſions. But our Iſle of Britain can beſt witneſs the diverſity of Conqueſts; having by the happy Victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all civil Arts; in exchange of Liberty, that was but ſlenderly inſtructed therein before, whereas the iſſue of the Saxon and Daniſh Wars, was, as were the cauſes, quite contrary. For theſe did not ſeek after the Dominion only, but the entire poſſeſſion of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the Britiſh Race, and defacing all memorial of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alſo of the Cimmerian Blood) found ſuch end of their enterpriſe, as it may ſeem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Aſia, did arrive unto. So that by conſidering the proceſs of the one, we ſhall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many Battles the Danes won; yet none of ſuch importance, as ſufficed to make them abſolute Conquerors: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not ſo great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in courſe of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred ſuch acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both theſe People, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one mild temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great ſlaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having diſburthened it ſelf of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeek their Graves abroad. And ſuch (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian War in Lydia; whereunto though ſome Victory of Halyattes may have haſtened the concluſion, yet the wearisome length of time ſeems to have done moſt in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould fear to add hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was ſo compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River of Halys ſhould divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eaſtern-ſide of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian People; whoſe Wives and Daughters theſe warlike Women are ſuppoſed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel enſuing, between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median ſought revenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutual ſlaughters, ſhould have joyned in a League of mutual defence, for their common ſafety: though otherwiſe it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdom ſo far Weſtward, whatſoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon ſuch as had ſpoiled each of their Countries. As for that occaſion of the War between theſe two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of litle weight, and leſs probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chaſed out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares; who committed unto them certain Boys, to be inſtructed in the Scythian Tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he) that theſe Scythians uſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them, did nevertheleſs otherwhiles miſs of their Game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholerick, bitterly reviled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom, dreſſing like Veniſon, they preſented unto him; which done they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that laſted ſix years between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding theſe Fugitives to be delivered into his hand; the other refuſing to betray ſuch Men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians, to betake themſelves to either of theſe Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularly they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treachery that he ſhewed in the maſſacring of their Country Men, that were in his Kingdom; of whom it is now meet that we ſhould ſpeak. Herod. lib. 1.

†. IV.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe Weſterly, along the ſhoars of the Euxine Sea: ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caſpian Sea on their left hand, paſſed between it and Caucaſus through Albania, Colchene, and other obſcure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and ſo they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Arms; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus Reigned in Ægypt. If it were in the sixth year of Nabulassar's Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have Reigned five and Thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the Great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely, for the Invasion of Syria, which Expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the Sword, refused not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome Guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more travel, would add a great deal more to their content. For they relied so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the bravest Men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Ægypt. I do not think: Babylon was near enough; whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them I do not read. But it is well known, that his Dominions lay in the midst between Media and Ægypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their Horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them Provender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progress (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Ægypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion, that he could use, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Ægypt was rich; and half the riches thereof had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Psammiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palæstina; whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians; but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so far different from their own. Psammiticus had at his back a vast Wilderness, over the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of Cold and wet, than of the contrary destempers, could ill have indured to pursue him, through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdom of Ægypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journy. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Ægyptian King (besides that he preserved his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hiring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the process of his Wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves, with the return of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolved now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Country, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas, and between India and Asia the Less. Happy it was for the poor people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new Comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private Men, to whose wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seems that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitful Country not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the Constitution of their Bodies; there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by Stratagem. The managing of the business is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunk; and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost. Herod. lib. 1.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelties than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloody Feast, made any stir in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by Invasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media was very strong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no less than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with less blood shed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtless in eight and twenty years had so well setled Herod. lib. 4.

themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many (of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the business, for which they came forth, were willing to return home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might go joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seek their fortunes in other Provinces, among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have been with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulassar: Mens love of their wealth being most effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that Nabuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of War, did beat the Ægyptians, who in Ages foregoing had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians, after another fashion: and this new success of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane means, to such addition as this of new Forces.

Jer. 25.9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their Kindred and Friends, in acquiring a new Seat, and establishing their Plantation. For these had left their Wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian Women to comfort themselves in their Husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their Slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the Children of Slaves which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tells us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens Eyes) it must needs be that they were very Boys, or else that the Women did very little while continue chast. Wherefore I rather believe the Tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I find it, in Mr. Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They understood by the way that their Cholopey, or Bond-slaves whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Towns, Lands, Houses, Wives, and all. At which news being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villany of their Servants, they made the more speed home: and so not far from Novogrod met them in Warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other shew of Weapon but with their Horse-whips (which as their manner is every Man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their Whips in their hands, they gave the onset. Which seemed so terrible in the ears of their Villains, and struck such a sense into them of the smart of the Whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this Victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coin (which they call a Dingoe Novogrodskoy, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a Whip aloft in his Hand. It may seem, that all the Women of that Country, have fared the worse ever since, in regard of this universal Fault: for such a Podkey or Whip, as terrified those Slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first Present that the Moscovian Wife, even in time of Wooing, sends to him that shall be her Husband, in token of subjection; being well assured, to feel it often on her own Loins. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians, (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Ruſ. Com. monw. cap. 4.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian Expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause, of the Ægyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judea, which continues yet a while the Centre of our Discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries in those Ages.

HAving thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoid all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and Men of Mark, as were between the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Ægyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdom, until the one and twentieth year of Josias; at which time Ancus Marcius succeeding Reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come Stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far by his graciousness among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the Sons of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and Reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians, bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former War, entred the Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the Race of the Bacida made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for Successor his Son Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile Acts, slew his own Wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian Women stark naked, burning their Apparrel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive that the wisdom of the Greeks, was not excellent in those days; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous Law givers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Laws of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was Drunk; or to go forth of the Town by Night, unless it were to some Sweet-hearts Bed; or to dress herself up in immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a Lover. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the Dispensation. It is noted in this Man as a singular example of justice, that when his own Son had committed Adultery, and was therefore to lose both his Eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one Eye of his own to save the young Man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not henceforth need, so far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldæans will soon fall under the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greeks, the Greeks with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befel them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in these many Ages, were erected, and thrown down: as likewise, many memorable Acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any near distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearsal, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Judæa, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans.

NOW to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entred Judæa with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehoiakim his Vassal in despight of Necho that had established him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a Child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he took a part of the Church-Treasures; but staied not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Jehoiakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazzard himself and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian Horse-men in his Army; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back, out of that rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his Father, happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to return home; and take possession of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Ægyptian was not ready to follow him so far and to bid him battel, until the New Year came in; which was the fourth of Jehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank of Euphrates (his own Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for Victory, Necho was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save it self, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This Victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Ægyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Ægyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehoiakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Ægyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldæan the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reservedness of Jehoiakim was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Ægyptian King Psammis, who succeeded unto Necho, began to think upon restoring Jehoahaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him up, as a Domestical Enemy, against his ungrateful Brother. Against all such accidents, the Judæan had prepared the usual remedy, practised by his Forefathers: for he had made his own Son Jechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but Eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz his return; the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shall not return thither, but he shall die in the place whither they have led him Captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Ægyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharp Steel, as of fair Gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis. Apries who Reigned after Psammis, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigg look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazzard of a battel. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words; telling such frivolous tales, as Men, that mean to do nothing, use, of their glorious Acts forepassed, against Josias and Jehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Jehoiakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understand, the sincerity of his affection towards them; which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehoiakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearful threats, as made the poor Judæan lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to Repentance, but because they had stopt their Ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their Captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatned to all the Neighbouring Nations, to the Ægyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the Wine of His Fury, whom they had forsaken, and after the seventy years expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and the Judæans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to read them unto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury they had first set Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Jer. 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51.

Jehoiakim after he heard a part of it and perceived the ill news therein delivered, made no more ado but did cut the Book in pieces and cast it into the Fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead Body of Jehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the Heat, and in the night to the Frost, and that there should be none of his Seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Ægyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldæan Forces; and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the term of seventy years, was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other Towns and Countries; it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have sure Authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the Siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign; as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the several beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third year of Jehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince, his Son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in express words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Ægypt; and then began to Reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein he saw that Vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigurate the succession of great Kingdoms, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but return unto the Siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign.

Jer. 25. 1.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the Main, by a deep and broad Channel of the Sea. The Chaldæans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multititude of goodly Ships, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every Wind, from one part or other, brought needful provisions into the City. Wherefore neither Force, nor Famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheless the Judgments of God (denounced against it by Isaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel,) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nebuchodonosor, had fully determined to perform it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertook a vast piece of work; even to fill up the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the Mountain of Libanus near adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other Trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen years were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopeless business. Which needeth not seem strange: for Alexander working upon that Foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosor's Peer; and being withal assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven months ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a Shelve; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his Foundations in the bottom of the deep; striving as it were, to fill the empty Belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every Man knows, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either Miracle, or such of his more immediate Weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of Man, to use the hand of Man; even the hand of Man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of Nature and Fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldæans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was Master of the Town.

Isai. 23. Jer. 25. Ezek. 26.

Ezek. 29.

When he was entred upon this desperate service; whether it were so, that some losses received, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely; and so Josephus reports it) some glorious rumors of the Ægyptians, gave courage to his evil willers; Jehoiakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea; where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Ægyptians having left him, as it were in a Dream) that he entred Jerusalem, and laid hands on Jehoiakim: whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing Counsel, he caused him to be slain slain in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Ass, to be devoured by Beasts and ravenous Birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Jehoiakim or Jechonias his Son; whom after three months and ten days Nabuchodonosor removed and sent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochæus, and Josedech, the High Priest. The Mother of Jechonias, together with his Servants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest Men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the Counsel of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befel him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This only particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in general words, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Juda, and called him Zedekias, which is as much to say, as the Justice of God. For like as Necho, King of Ægypt, had formerly displaced Jehoahaz, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Jehoiakim the Son of another Mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehoiakim who depended on the Ægyptians, and carrying his Son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedekias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoahaz, whom Neco took with him into Ægypt. From Zedekias he required an Oath for his faithful obedience, which Zedekias gave him, and called the living God to witness in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first year of Zedekias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judæans that were carried away Captive, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedekiah, Jeremy wrote in a Book all the evil that should fall upon Babylon, which Book or Scroll he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedekias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jews, and then to bind it to a Stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her. The journy of Zedekias to Babel is probably thought to have been in way of Visitation, carrying some Presents. But I further think, that he had some Suit there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. Jer. 27. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made Bonds and Yokes; one of which he wore about his own Neck, others he sent unto the five Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedekias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possess and enjoy their own Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the Sword, by Fire, and by Pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels, which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travel after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the wooden Chain which Jeremy ware, in sign of the Captivity of the Jews, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years, God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he laid on all Nations; restore Jechonias, and all the Jews, with the Vessels and Riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy instead of his wooden Yoke ware a Collar of Iron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitful and false hope to the People, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second month. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his Reign he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aids of the Ægyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedekias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Ægypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdom of Juda should be extirpate, until the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy and imprisoned him. For Gen. 49. 10. Jeremy had told the King, that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, Jer. 32. & 34. but be taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the Sword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Jerusalem being, the following year, surrounded by Nabuchodonosor's Army; the King of Ægypt, Pharaoh Hophra according to Jeremy (Herodotus Jer. 44. calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda, with Herod. l. 2. his Army, to succour Zedekias, of whose revolt he had been the principal Author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithful Counsel, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Ægypt: for he assured them, that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldæans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Ægyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Ægypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poor People of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the mean while the Jews, who, in their first extremity, had manumised their Hebrew Bondmen (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubilee) and made them Free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldæan Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the Siege, Jer. 34. the the Prophet Jeremy, when the State of Jeruſalem began now to grow to extremity, counſelled Zedekias to render himſelf unto them; aſſuring him of his own life, and the ſafety of the City, if he would ſo do. But his obſtinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his Infidelity and Perjury, had provided for him.

Jer. 39. Three and twenty Months (as ſome do reckon it) or according to Joſephus eighteen; the Babylonian Army lay before Jeruſalem, and held it exceeding ſtraitly beſieged. For they built Forts againſt it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum, they ſurrounded the City with wooden Towers, ſo as the beſieged could neither ſally out, nor receive into the City any ſupply of Men or Victuals. Joſephus reports, that they over-topped the Walls, with high Towers raiſed upon Mounts; from which they did ſo beat upon the Wall with their Engines, that the Defendants were compelled to forſake their ſtations. Now although it were ſo that the beſieged alſo raiſed Counter-buildings, like unto theſe, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as faſt from without, as they raiſed from within; the Body and Foundation of his own Works being guarded, by the Walls of Jeruſalem interpoſed; and theirs within, laid open to their Enemies diſturbance. Beſides, both Famine and Peſtilence (which commonly accompany Men ſtraitly beſieged) grew on faſt upon them, whereby, when the number, ſtrength, and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldæans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did ſeat themſelves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle Gate. Zedekias beholding this uncomfortable ſight, and finding no remedy of the danger preſent, loſt both his courage and his hope at once; and ſhifted himſelf together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principal Servants, out of the City, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideleſs People, to the mercileſs Swords of their Enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perſwaded him to render himſelf, deſpiſed both the Counſel of God and the force of Nabuchodonoſor; uſed now that remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth, triſte, turpe, & infelix, woful, ſhameful, and unfortunate.

Joſeph. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 11.

By this ſecret ſubterrane Vault, Zedekias making his ſtealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Deſerts of Jericho: but by reaſon of the Train, that followed him and his, (every one leading with him thoſe whom they held moſt dear unto them) he was eaſily traced and purſued. How great ſoever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Joſephus reports it, they on whoſe fidelity he moſt repoſed himſelf, no ſooner beheld the Chaldæans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and ſhifted themſelves into the Deſarts as they could. For whom God had forſaken, no Man followed, but the Miniſters of his Vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Priſoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conveighed to Rebla or Reblath a City (as ſome think) of Nepthalim, where Nabuchodonoſor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jeruſalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 11.

Now after Nabuchodonoſor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falſhood and perjury wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends to be ſlain before his Face. This being done, to the end that ſo lamentable a ſpectacle ſhould be the laſt, that ever he ſhould behold in the World, he cauſed his Eyes to be torn out of his Head, and ſo carried him in a ſlaviſh manner to Babel, where he conſumed the reſt of his wretched life in perpetual impriſonment. Herein this moſt marvelous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonem & ipſam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon and he ſhall not ſee it.

Thus in the Eleventh and laſt year of Zedekias which was the Eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, the Chaldæans entred the City by force, where ſparing no Sex nor Age, they committed all to the Sword that they therein found. Ezech. 12.

In the year next following, Nabuzaradan, General of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the reſt of Jeruſalem: and after this fire had laſted from the ſeventh to the tenth day, he alſo burnt the Temple of God to the Ground, when it had ſtood four hundred thirty and one years. 3434

After this upon a ſecond ſearch, Nabuzaradan (not yet ſatiated with blood) commanded ſeventy and two others to be ſlaughtered, which had hidden themſelves from the firſt fury, to wit, the chief and the ſecond Prieſt, two Commanders of Zedechias his Men of War, five of his Houſehold-ſervants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ableſt of the people throughout all Judæa, and leaving the pooreſt labouring Souls, with ſome that followed the party of Nabuchodonoſor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Joſias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his juſtice and equity, by Joſephus highly commended. This Man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it ſeemeth, in the beginning of the War: and by Jeremie's deſire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the ſame advice, which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to ſubmit himſelf altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exerciſe his juſtice, was therefore reſiſtleſs. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldæa, or elſewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jews that were left under his charge, promiſing them favour and liberty, ſo long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonoſor, by whom he was eſtabliſhed Provincal Governour of his own Nation. 2 King. ult.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings houſe (who during the Siege of Jeruſalem, had kept himſelf out of the ſtorm, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other choſen Men, while Godoliah feaſted them in Maſpha or Mitſpa, the City of his reſidence, traiterouſly ſlew him, together with divers Chaldæans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an eſcape, and in his way encountring with eighty perſons, repairing towards Godoliah with Preſents he ſlew the moſt of them, and ſpared the reſt, becauſe they they promiſed to diſcover unto him ſome Treaſures, hidden in the fields during the War. He alſo took with him a Daughter of Zedechiah, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonoſor. This practice and intent of Iſmael had been formerly diſcovered unto Godoliah by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judæa being now left without a Governour (for Iſmael durſt not take it upon him, but retired himſelf, or rather fled as faſt as he could to the Ammonites) the reſidue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldæans, reſolved to flie away into Ægypt, and beſought Jeremy to aks counſel of God for them: who readily made them anſwer, That if they remained in Judæa, God would provide for them and ſhew them mercy; but if they ſought to ſave themſelves in Ægypt, that they ſhould then undoubtedly periſh. Notwithanding this advice, the Jews held their determination; and deſpiſing the Oracle of God, and conſtraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Ægypt, and inhabited by the permiſſion of Pharaoh, near unto Taphnes: where, when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the deſtruction of themſelves, and the Ægyptians alſo, he was by theſe his own hard-hearted and ungrateful Countrimen, ſtoned to Death; and by the Ægyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried near the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

Of the time paſſing between the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the Fall of the Aſſyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and Prophane Hiſtory.

THE courſe of Time; which in Prophane Hiſtories might rather be diſcerned through the greateſt part of his way, hitherto paſſed in ſome out-worn foot-ſteps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eaſtern Countries by the account from Nabonaſſar, left ſurer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Jeruſalem to diſcover the connexion of Antiquity fore-ſpent, with the Story of ſucceeding Ages. Manifeſt it is, that the original and progreſs of things could ill be ſought in thoſe that were ignorant of the firſt Creation: as likewiſe that the Affairs of Kingdoms and Empire afterwards grown up are not to be found among thoſe, that have now no ſtate nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore purſued the Story of the World unto that Age, from whence the memory of ſucceeding accidents is with little interruption or fabulous diſcourſe derived unto us,

I hold it now convenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry Metals, discovered by God unto Nabuchadnezzar, did Reign over the Earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I do not hold it needful, to insist upon those Authorities, which give, as it were by hearsay, a certain Year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his Line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie upon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmony, which some have found in the years of those overworn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by Prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what age each of them lived, but not in what year his Reign began or ended, were it not that the Reign of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the Sacred and Prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the Captivity of Juda, which ended when 70. years were expired; and these 70. years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the Race of Men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his Reign in Persia, by general consent, is joyned with the first year of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those Antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved Faith and Industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the Battel of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity are the marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the World, through any Story, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the 70. years, during which it continued, even from Nabuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

§. II.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions, touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an Answer to the cavils of Porphyry, inveighing against S. Matthew, and Daniel, upon whom the later of these Opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began when Jechonias was carried Prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth Chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these words: In the five and twentieth year of our being in captivity in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim, which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of long disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel, have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched Man Porphyry, who, not understanding how the Sons of King Josias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the Sons, or, according to some Translations, the Son and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyry doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians, affirming that these Prophecies and Visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seventy Interpreters who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turn this Book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other Argument to confound Porphyry, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only staied his hand from the harm of that City and People, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthned thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Ezek. c. 1. v. 2. c. 3. v. 11. & 15.

It is true indeed that the Jews themselves give less Authority to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accounting his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or Holy Writings, which they say Esdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon.

bylon. But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical: Secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils, and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368 after the death of Jovinian the Emperor, and after the Nicene Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epitome of the same Council it may be seen, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth Book, and five and twentieth Chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weigths and Measures, &c. To these I may add S. Hierom, Gregory Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiographa Books or holy Writings the Jews and Rabbins reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniel's visions.

§. III.

That the 70 years of Captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonia.

HAving thus far digressed, in maintaining that Authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70 years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius and some few nameless Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away Captives to Babylon: First Manasses; then Jehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities the beginning of the 70 years is referred by none that I have read; to the second by few and with weak proof; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words. Thus saith the Lord: After 70 years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place. Jerem. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy had already in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, denounced the judgment of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words. Behold, I will send and take to me all the Families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my Servant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the Mill-stones, and the light of the Candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70 years. And when 70 years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed unto the Captivity the term of 70 years, which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehoiakim, who then Reigned, was taken by Nabuchodonosor; nor yet in the time of Jechonia; but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70 years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus. They burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the pretious Vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the Sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were Servants to him and to his Sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her full of her Sabbaths: for all the days that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70 years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was finished) the Lord stirred up the Spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise, how either the desolation could have been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient, unto this exposition of Jeremiah his Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lie wast 70 years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70 Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised by Prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth us in these words. In the first year of his Reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years, whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70 years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonia, did account, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the Jerem. 29. vers. 16, 17, & 18. 2 Chron. 36. 19. Dan. 9. 2.

nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of 70. years. This I will not further seek to prove, by the Authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any Man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70 years.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these 70 years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diadem, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the Age wherein they lived, nor the length of their Reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The Conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the Victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous Building of his great Babel, for the House of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great State, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Soldiers, in such Skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no less. For whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished, that hardy piece of Work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning it unto the Continent, filling up the deep and broad Channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a Mole, or Peer of Earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexander's Works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their Bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs, as soon as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance offered to charge them.

Xenophon. Cyropæd. lib. 1.

Now as their actions, from the end of Nebuchadnezzar's Wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and Reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70 years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothful Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their Children, living in the Ægyptian servitude; resting satisfied in both with the general assured summ.

Xenophon. Cyropæd. 1. & l. 3.

Yet for as much as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70 years, not only by the Reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their Opinions, and shewing what I think, may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 4.

The Opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several Reigns. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerly follow the Authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the Mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his own Will, and making it known that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, until the very time of his land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldæan Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein than such as may grow out of Mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto Prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all Histories were on the one side, and the Letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

Jer. 27. v. 7.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports are so slender and unsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent from father to son, through five Generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the Great, and giving to him 43 years, to Evilmerodach 18, to Nigliſar the Son of Evilmerodach 40, to Labosardach the Son of Nigliſar 9 months, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the Race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this Opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthasar the Son of Labosardach) Saint Jerome doth follow, alledging Berosus, and Josephus as a Sectator of Berosus for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us that Evilmerodach the Son of Nabuchodonosor did Reign but two years, being for his wickedness and lust, slain by his Sisters Husband Nizaglissoroor, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Labosardach, who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years. This relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of Years, or of Generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some Authority, so that the Names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon Trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last

Jos. An. lib. 10. cap. 12.

laſt Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who ſaith that the laſt King of Babylon was immediate Succeſſor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Scholaſtical Hiſtory, who is founder of this Opinion, placeth between him that took Jeruſalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonoſor: plain it is that he hath, out of any Hiſtory ſacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reaſon to follow him. Euſebius, Sulpitius Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground, have ſuppoſed, that Evilmerodach and Balthaſar were Brethren and Sons of the great Nabuchadonoſor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthaſar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nebuchodonoſor his Son. And ſo common grew this Explication, that Saint Jerome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthaſar was not the Son indeed, but the Grand-child of that great Conquerour, though by the Phraſe very common in Scriptures, and familiar in thoſe Eaſtern Languages, he was called the Son.

Annius his Metaſthenes hits very rightly the ſeventy years of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonoſor 45 years, to Evilmerodach 30 years, and to the three Sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonoſor 14 years; that is, to Reg-Aſſer the eldeſt Son three years, to Lab-Aſſer Dach the ſecond Son ſix years, and to Balthaſar the third Son five.

To this Accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole ſumm of years, and in the number of Generations, I have ſometime ſubſcribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reaſon than becauſe the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not ſatisfie my ſelf herein; both for that none of the ancient, and few ſuch of the modern Writers as deſerve to be regarded, have conſented with Metaſthenes; and for that in making Balthaſar to ſucceed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly againſt Xenophon, whoſe Hiſtory of the elder Cyrus in his Aſſyrian War I cannot ſlightly value in many reſpects, and eſpecially becauſe it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken Feaſt.

Seeking therefore diligently into all Circumſtances that might give any light in this obſcurity, I found manifeſt proof, that the time allotted unto Balthaſar, by Annius his Metaſthenes, was far ſhort of the truth, which is enough to render all ſuſpected that he hath ſaid in diſtributing what part of the 70 years he pleaſed among the reſt. For in the third year of Belthaſar, Daniel ſaw a Viſion, after which he was ſick certain days, but when he roſe up he did the Kings Buſineſs: from which Buſineſs, that he did afterwards withdraw himſelf, and live retired, ſo long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen uſed to ſet out his ſufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his preſence, whether he were Daniel. Now to think that a Man of ſuch Account and Place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my Judgment a very ſtrange Conceit, which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented, to think the whole Story (thus related) a part of Annius his Impoſtures.

Out of theſe Reports of Joſephus, Beroſus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and theſe years extending unto the firſt of Cyrus, in which courſe of time Nebuchadnezzar, his Son and Grand-child, muſt have reigned; it hath ſeemed needful to ſupply the years of theſe three deſcents, by inſerting ſome whoſe Reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity, with which the time allotted by Beroſus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthaſar, joyned unto the years following the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Jeruſalem was laid deſolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, faſhion the years of Evilmerodach in this ſort. They ſay, that the 18 years given to him by Joſephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, ſhould be read and numbred 28 years, and the two years that Beroſus hath allowed to Evilmerodach ſhould be written 23: in the firſt number the figure of [1] is miſtaken for the figure of [2] and in the latter there ſhould have been added the figure of [3] to that of [2:] this granted [to wit] that Evilmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the ſame number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonoſor lived after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, make 49, then 4 years of Niglisar according to Beroſus, 9 Months of Labaſſardach his Son, and 17 years of Labonidus or Balthaſar make up the number of 70 years to the firſt of Cyrus. But whether by Errour in Figures, or in Words, the Numbers be utterly miſtaken, in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who have nothing to help them, ſave only the bare Names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifeſtly corrupted, and ſuch as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy, to have that place of Jeremy called into diſpute, in regard of their Authority?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the Number, Perſons, and Reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher ſuppoſitions, little different in ſubſtance from this of Mercator, I purpoſely forbear to rehearſe, as falling under the ſame Anſwer. That of Joſeph Scaliger I may not forget, as deſerving to be conſidered apart from the reſt. He gives to Nabuchadnezzar 44 years, to Evilmerodach 2, to Belſazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jeruſalem was deſtroyed, unto the time of Cyrus he accompteth only 59 years; beginning as (many do) the Captivity 11 years ſooner, from the Tranſportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath been ſaid already. That which we are now to conſider, is his diſtribution of the time running between the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldaan Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquiſition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzar's Reign, I ſhall hereafter upon better occaſion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very ſhort, and more preciſely agreeing with Beroſus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the firſt of his Reign, ſhewing all favour to Jechonia, did among among other things take order for him at his Table; and that he did continually eat Bread before him all the days of his life. His Portion was a continual Portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain, all the days of his life until he died. The very ſound of theſe words (which is more to be eſteemed, than the Authority of Beroſus, were he perfectly extant) imports a far longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort ſent by God, whoſe Commandment he had obeyed in yielding himſelf to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby that all his remaining days he eat Bread before this King. Now that he lived not ſo ſhort a while after this as two years, it is more than likely, for he was but 55 years old when he was ſet at liberty, having been 37 years in the Priſon, whereinto he was caſt at the age of 18 years; after which time it ſeems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is ſaid to have been but a young Man, and one of Darius his Pages threeſcore years after this, as by other circumſtances of his impriſonment it ſelf.

Jerem. 52. ver. 33. & 34.

Of Belſazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him alſo Laboroſoardoch, I ſhould wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzar's Daughters Son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Beroſus, by ſhifting in his Nirigliſſoroor, as Husband to Nabuchadnezzar's Daughter, and Protector of his Son four of theſe years; by which means there remains about one year to Belſazer alone, agreeing nearly with the 9 months aſſigned by Beroſus to the Son of Nigliſar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his Son, and to his Sons Son (not to his Daughters Son) that the Empire was promiſed: which difficulty if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him, to paſs it over with ſilence.

Nabonidus the laſt of theſe, whom others (deſirous to reconcile Beroſus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthaſar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Beroſian: for Beroſus makes him of the ſame Stock or Race a Babylonian. I ſpeak not this to diſgrace the Travel of that moſt learned Man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgment, that he was not ſo wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to ſhew that he himſelf having in ſome points diſliked thoſe Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reaſon have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Beroſus calls Nabonidus, was the ſame whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: Firſt, the Phraſe of Scripture, which ſignifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not ſaying that he won it by force of Arms. Secondly, a fragment of Megaſthenes found in Euſebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek Tranſlation, which expreſſing no force of Arms doth only ſignifie, that Darius took or received the Kingdom; I ſee no reaſon why we ſhould thereupon infer, that the next King entred by Election: ſeeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumſtances of Balthaſar's death, but only the ſwift accompliſhment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been ſaid (if Daniel had cared to uſe the moſt expreſſive terms) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom; ſeeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abſence of Darius, though by his Forces, and to his uſe. Now concerning the fragment of Megaſthenes, true it is, that in Euſebius his Works printed at Baſil, in the year 1559. I find only thus much of Megaſthenes, cited out of Alphenus; That Nabuchodonoſor, was more valiant than Hercules; that he ſubdued all Lybia, and the reſt of Aſia as far as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldaans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with a Divine fury, he cried with a loud voice, O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great Calamity that ſhall come upon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the Gods ſhall avert: There will come a Perſian, half an Aſs, that ſhall bring ſlavery upon ye: and that, this and the like when he had ſpoken, he vaniſhed. Of all this I believe little or nothing, ſaving that Nabuchodonoſor knew before hand, that his Empire ſhould be tranſlated, as Daniel had foretold from the Golden Head, to the Silver Breaſt. But that he won all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's Copy of Euſebius were the more perfect, out of which Megaſthenes tells us that Nabuchodonoſor won both Africk and Spain, I believe the fragment ſo much the leſs: and am as little moved with the Authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Aſſyrians, as where it tells of Nabuchadnezzar his own vaniſhing away. Indeed that ſame Title of half an Aſs, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to ſuſpect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, becauſe his Parentage was more Noble on the Mothers ſide, than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Aſſes upon Mares. And thus much in anſwer of the two principal Foundations whereon this Opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it hath within it ſelf, I eaſily allow it. But this proves nothing, for meer fictions have not wanted theſe commendations: neither can any Man believe that one ſo judicious, induſtrious and deeply learned as Joſeph Scaliger, would over-ſhoot himſelf in ſetting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it ſeems that Scaliger, well knowing his own ſufficiency, hath been little careful to ſatisfie Men that would frame Arguments againſt him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Balthaſar was divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians, either we muſt think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or elſe we muſt bethink our ſelves what Perſian it might be that ſhared the Kingdom with him. For it is not more certain, that Balthaſar loſt his Life and Kingdom, than that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Perſians. Neither did the Medes and Perſians fall out and fight for it, as by ſuppoſing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they ſhould be thought to have done; but theſe two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the ſubject Provinces, inſomuch that the Greek Hiſtorians did commonly call thoſe Wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Wars of the Medes. Yea to clear this point, even Daniel himſelf reſembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ram with two Horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Perſians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joſeph Scaliger, for maintaining upon ſuch good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was Partner with with Cyrus in his Victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be the less regarded for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose Authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any Mans Faith or Knowledge of those times, half so well as Daniel's, whom I believe that he understood as far as was needful in this case. Lawful it was for him to alledge all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect of the same things that were contained in the Writings of the Jews, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman World, where they were Strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even so do Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the Testimonies of Heathen Books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in general by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaliger's Opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his Learning and Judgment, which if in some things it had not failed, the Miracle had been very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his Successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weakness, who cannot find how the 70 years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the Holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Pererius, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose Feet have failed them in the slippery ways of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedless reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my Opinion, wherein the Judgment of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Nigliſar and Labosardach to be meant the same Persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the Reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43 years of Reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needless: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

2 Kin. 2. 5. 8. & Jer. 51. 12. 2 King. 24. 12. Manifest it is, that the 19 year of Nabuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11 of Zedekia; as also that his eighth year, was the first year of Jechonia his Captivity; the Reign of Zedekia occupied all the mean space being of 11 years. This is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofs: As for the beginning of his Successor Evilmerodach, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his Captivity; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35 whole years, and peradventure a good part of the six and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with so great favour, not until the end of the year. Substracting therefore out of these four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzar's Reign did well-near occupy, those eighteen years of his which passed away before the Captivity of Juda, and ruin of the city, we have remaining six and twenty years of the seventy, that were almost wholly spent, when his Son began to Reign. 2 King. 25. 27. & Jer. 52. 31.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon until the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needful: the whole summ being certain, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothful Princes. Neither can any Man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70 years, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjectural; seeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both unlikely and separate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more material) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account at Nabuchadnezzar's death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then having Authority good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, in giving us seventeen years to Balthasar, we find left in our hands to bestow upon Evilmerodach six and twenty years. Of the year belonging to Darius the Mede I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthasar did Reign seventeen years, we have the Authority of Josephus, before cited in expres words; we have also the general consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; and Balthasar to have been one. But nothing moveth me so much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthasar he followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his Reign, (a proof sufficient of no few years, passing under this Man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel's employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his Wars against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this Mans Father, and being always prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midway: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible that the Reign of Evilmerodach was not short; and that Men of Great Judgment have found it most probable that he was King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that Books of such Antiquity, Dan. 8. v. 1. & 27. & 9. v. 11, 12, & 13.

Antiquity, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark passages of Antiquity. I will yet confess, that were his Works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open Enemy. How much less ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight Lines, and part even of the Title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures have told us that God gave the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his Son, and to his Sons
Jer. 27. 7. Son: How long each of them held it, we find not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach us; provided always, that helping us in a particularity, he destroy not thereby the general Truth. More words are needless. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Josephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelessness of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to err in writing two for six and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second Figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character ς. signifying 6. hath a nearer resemblance of β that stands for 2. than hath γ which is used for 3. So that the numeral Notes β ς. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked Hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former Letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different Figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in βγ standing for 23. I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical Figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore do not appertain to this Business; unless we should guess that his Works were corrupted in that unlearned Age, which following the Saracen Conquest, was little occupied in the Studies of Humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the Doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our Friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his Authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel; when they seem his opposites.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the Destruction of Jerusalem and Conquest of Ægypt.

With what Actions this time of 70 years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in Record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an Argument we might as well deny to many People even their being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothful Age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the Posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their Ease and Pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their days in the restless travel of purchasing. Though indeed the Reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthful and stronger years having been exercised in Victorious Arms, no small part of his Life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy Labours past. The nineteenth year of his Reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty City of Jerusalem, he enriched himself with abundance of Spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, until his three and twentieth year, he laboured in the Conquest of those adjoyning Regions, which God had exposed unto his Sword, and commanded to wear his Yoke; namely the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Ægyptians, though some of these were already become his Followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians whose City was founded on an Iland, safe enough from any danger of a Land-Army, and whose Fleet was so strong that they needed not to fear any Enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their Neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate Resolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his Power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same Quarrel against the common Enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common Voice of Tyrus; Aha, the Gate of the People Ezek. 26. 2 is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at the length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great Work of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appear above the Waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those Prophecies of Jeremy and of Esay, Jer. 25. Esai. 23. 15. which appoint unto this desolation of Tyre the same term of 70 years, that was prescribed unto the Reign of the Chaldæans, do plainly shew, that she followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like Fortune. The Particularities which doubtless were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a Siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we find, that the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Nevertheless it seems that this evasion served only the principal Men, who escaping with their Goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the Enemies fury. For not only such People of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the Field) were put to the Sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which with excessive labour the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Army to serve a great Ezek. 29. v. 8. 10, 11. Ezek. 29. 18.
service against Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Army; but was fain to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that City, which in all Mens Judgments had been held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerful Cities, having made the Name of the Chaldæans dreadful in the Ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that Reputation which he had obtained by Victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with less pain. The Kingdom of Ægypt was the Mark at which he aimed; a Country

so abounding in all Riches and Pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seek occasion of Quarrel against it; and so far an Enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the Conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Nevertheless it was needful that before he entred into this Business, the Countries adjacent should be reduced into such terms, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the Decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous Enterprises, with Reason of State. For the People of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian Swords, were such, as regarding only their own Gain, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Army, to feed upon the Carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his Victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his Fury, he should be fain to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Jews when their City was taken. What good Service they had done to the Chaldeans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own Purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entred upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that Practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the Blood of Juda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the People that abode in Mispah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many Labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like Policy the Moabites did exercise; whose Pride and Wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

Ezek. 25. 12. & 15.
Ezek. 25. 3. Jer. 49. 1.
Jerem. 40. 14. & 41. 2. & 10
Jerem. 28. 27, &c.

All these Nations had the Art of Ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon Desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their thievish Wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their Devices by sharp and sudden War, overwhelming them with unexpected Ruine, as it were in one Night; according to the Prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who fore-told with little difference of words, the greatness and swiftness of the Misery that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Ægyptian Expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Towns in these Regions were burnt, and the People slain, or made Slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by Flight, had not the courage to return to their Habitations over-hastily, much less to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable Out-Laws, or at least oppressed Wretches, until the end of the seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

Esay 16. 14.

§. VIII.

That Ægypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the Opinion of most Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

WHen by a long course of Victory Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise that no Enemy to himself, nor Friend of the Ægyptian, was left at his Back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the Conquest of Ægypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needless to look after more Authority, or to cite for Proof half of that which may be alledged out of these. Nevertheless we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a Sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the Honour of having done some spoil in Ægypt, omitting the Conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many Men take in the means and second helps conducing to their Purpose, that often-times they prefer the Commentator before the Author; and to up-hold a Sentence giving Testimony to one Clause, do carelesly overthrow the History it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The Reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Ægypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former Book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus affirms that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unless we should understand that he was Victorious in the War which he is said to have made upon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned five and twenty years, and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The Rebellion of the Ægyptians he imputeth to a great Loss which they received in an Expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamity the People of Ægypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed; that so he might with greater security reign over such as stayed at home. So they who escaped, and the Friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the Tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the Rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to truſt unto his foreign Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept in readineſs thirty thouſand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquiſhed by the great numbers of the Ægyptian Forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thouſand, which were all by Birth and Education, Men of War. Apries himſelf being taken Priſoner, was gently intreated by Amaſis for a while, until the Ægyptians exclaiming upon him as an extream Enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and ſtrangled him, yet gave him Honourable Burial. Such is the Report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus nearly agrees, telling us that Apries did vanquiſh the Cyprians and Phœnicians in Battel at Sea, took by force and demoliſhed Sidon, wan the other Towns of Phœnicia, and the Iſle of Cyprus, and finally periſhed as is before rehearſed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This Authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his Hiſtory, if greater Authority did not contradict it. But the deſtruction of Ægypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with theſe Relations, hath greater force to compel our Belief, than have the Traditions of Ægyptian Prieſts (which Greek Hiſtorians followed) and greater Probabilities to perſwade thoſe that look only into Humane Reaſons. For Eſay propheſied long before of the ſhameful Captivity of the Ægyptians, whom the King of Aſſhur ſhould carry away naked, young and old, in ſuch wiſe that the Jews who fled unto them for deliverance from the Aſſyrian, ſhould be aſhamed of their own vain confidence in Men ſo unable to defend themſelves.

Eſa. 20. v. 4, 5, & 6.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, ſo they handled this Argument more preciſely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Ægypt ſhould be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as Wages for the Service which he had done at Tyre: Alſo he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Ægypt, ſaying, That theſe by Name ſhould be deſtroyed and go into captivity; yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army ſhould be ſlain by the Sword. Wherefore it muſt needs be a violent Expoſition of theſe Prophecies, which by applying the iſſue of ſuch Threatnings to an Inſurrection and Rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Ægypt, than change of the Kings Perſon, wherein Amaſis did ſucceed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniform Conſent of all the People. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Ægypt ſhould ſee Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his Enemies, as Zedekia had been, were to be referred unto the time of that Rebellion whereof Herodotus hath ſpoken, as the general Opinion hath over-ruled it, then was it vainly done of the ſame Prophet (which God forbid that any Chriſtian ſhould think, ſeeing he did it by the appointment of God himſelf) to hide in the Clay of a Brick-hill, thoſe very Stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonoſor ſhould be ſet, and his Pavilion ſpread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than falſe, which expreſſed the end of Pharaoh thus. Behold, I will viſit the common People of No, and Pharaoh and Ægypt, with their Gods and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that truſt in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of thoſe that ſeek their lives, and into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar King of Babel, and into the hands of his Servants. The clearneſs of this Prophecy being ſuch as could not but refute that interpretation

Ezek. 29. verſ. 20. & c. 30. Ezek. 32. verſ. 31.

Jer. 44. 30. Jer. 43. 10.

Jerem. 46. v. 25. & 26.

of many other places, which referred all to the Rebellion of Amaſis, it cauſed me to wonder what thoſe Commentators would ſay to it, who are elſewhere ſo diligent in fitting all to the Greek Hiſtorians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the Enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amaſis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Ægyptian Prieſts had notably deluded Herodotus with Lies, coined upon a vain-glorious Purpoſe of hiding their own Diſgrace and Bondage. And ſurely it may well be thought, that the Hiſtory of Nebuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews whom it concerned, than to the Greeks that ſcarcely at any time heard of his Name. Therefore I ſee no cauſe why we ſhould not rather believe Joſephus, reporting that Nabuchodonoſor in the three and twentieth year of his Reign, and the fifth year of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, did conquer Ægypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his ſtead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meer ſtrangers to this Buſineſs had no greater reaſon to labour in ſearching out the Truth, but might reſt contented with any thing that the Prieſts would tell them. Now if ſetting aſide all advantage of Authority, we ſhould only conſider the Relations of Joſephus, and of the Greek Hiſtorians, as either of them might be verified of it ſelf by apparent Circumſtances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets or Ægyptian Prieſts; me-thinks the death of Apries can no way be approved as having been wrought by conſent of the People, but affords great matter of ſuſpicion; yea though no Man had oppoſed the Reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great Love and Honour which the Ægyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform Teſtimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the Report of Diodore himſelf. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great Victories, did for one only loſs fall into the hatred of all his People, or which may ſerve to perſwade us, that a King of Ægypt would ſeek, or ſo demean himſelf, that he might be thought to ſeek the deſtruction of his natural Subjects? As for that Army of thirty thouſand Souldiers Carians and Ionians, which the King of Ægypt whom Amaſis took Priſoner, is ſaid to have kept for his Defence: doth it not argue that he was a Foreigner, and one that armed himſelf againſt the Ægyptians, wiſhing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Countrey, as aſſuredly their own, as the ſtrength of their own Bodies? It were more tedious than any way needful, to uſe all Arguments that might be alledged in this Caſe. The very death of this ſuppoſed Apries, which the clamours of the People obtained of Amaſis, who ſought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was ſome Foreign Governour, not a natural Prince; otherwiſe the People would have deſired to ſave his Life, and Amaſis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to diſprove that opinion, whereunto I ſhould not have yielded, though it had ſtood upon great apparence of Truth, conſidering that the voice of Truth it ſelf cries out againſt it; but leave the Circumſtances proving the Conqueſt of Ægypt by Nabuchodonoſor to be obſerved, where due occaſion in courſe of the Story following ſhall preſent them.

How Ægypt was subdued and held by Nebuchadnezzar.

IT is a great loss, that the general History of the World hath suffered, by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memory of such famous Actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all his former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel: who reckons up in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Ægypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as People subdued by this great Babylonian. The Circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the Victory was easie and swift, any Man shall find, who will take the pains to confer the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself safe in Ægypt by the well defenced situation of his Countrey, did very unwisely in suffering his Enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by consuming all his Friends and Adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this Business did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vain security of the Ægyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the Enemy was to make through the Arabian Deserts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in Provision for the War, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the Hearts of Men fail, when those Helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their own Vertue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Ægypt had flourished under the Rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand and five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness, yet so, that it was never dreadful unto others, God having said of that People, I will diminish them that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the Son of the Wise, I am the Son of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Ægypt now became Fools, the River failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient Linage quite extinguished. This came to pass in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his Room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon, the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this Business, and the Business it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away those unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable Ruines of that great City; which was in the same three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, is not unprobably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Ægyptian Expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us that there was another King put in the Room of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Viceroy, and not (as some have mistaken it) think that that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his Reign in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the Prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience imagine that there were two successively bearing the Name of Amasis; others that there were two Apries, the one slain by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a Name, it being once granted that the Person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of Life and Kingdom by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Neco, and made War (as they report) upon the Phœnicians, who were, before the Ægyptians, become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Governour of Ægypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Assyrian than Ægyptian Name; unless we should think that he had been a Traitor to his natural Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Ægypt; that he was not so fooliish as to give it away, any Man may guess; that he appointed one to Rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath Authority of Josephus; that this Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterward taken and slain by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my self; and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the Army which this Ægyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the Garrisons of mercenary Souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the Guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the Company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the Friends of such as were slain in that Expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Historians, deposed and slew Apries, I take them to have been the Ægyptian Fugitives which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty years will I gather the Ægyptians from the People where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Ægypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pathros into the Land of their Habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom. If the Ægyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the Tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised Matter that had no shadow of Truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the Truth with them.

Of the ſundry Accompts drawn from ſundry Acts of Nebuchadnezzar and of the deſtruction of Ninivie, by him; the time of which Action is uncertain.

THeſe Victories brought the Greatneſs of the Aſſyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's Reign in ſundry places of Scripture. To ſpeak any more of the Queſtions ariſing about the ſupputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might ſeem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third year of Jehoiakim's Reign (which ran along with ſome part of Nebuchadnezzar's firſt year) and was kept in Diet three years more, before he was brought into the King's preſence; it could not be the ſecond of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten Dream of the great Image, foreſhewing the Succeſſion of Monarchies, but the ſecond of his Empire. The ſame or the like may be ſaid of divers places which refer ſundry Matters unto their ſet years; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where he fore-tells that Ægypt ſhould be given in Reward for the Service done before Tyrus, dating his Prophecy in the ſeven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the Erection of the Golden Image in the eighteenth year: for theſe years held no dependance upon either the beginning of Nabuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to ſome memorable Action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not eaſie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain ſearch.

Dan. c. 1. & 2.

Of any War made by Nabuchadnezzar after ſuch time as he returned from the Conqueſt of Ægypt I do not read: excepting that againſt Ninivie, the deſtruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Ninivie had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been ſhewed) and together with the reſt of Aſſyria made ſubject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling againſt the Chaldæan, as Jehoiakim and Zedekias tributary Kings of Juda had done, taſted likewiſe of the ſame Fortune. That the deſtruction of Ninivie followed the Conqueſt of Ægypt, it appeareth by the Compariſon which Nahum the Prophet made between this City that was to fall, and the City of No in Ægypt that was fallen already. But how long after this came to paſs, it is (me-thinks) unpoſſible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the firſt of Nabuchadnezzar's Reign; the place of Nahum laſt cited is enough to diſprove it. Whereas it is referred by ſome unto the firſt of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Ægyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went between the one and the other, argueth ſtrongly, that there was a longer ſpace of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this deſtruction, or other Circumſtances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonoſor in Perſon, or by his Lieutenants, were ſomewhat like unto the vain Curioſity of Tiberius Cæſar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle pains which he ſhould take; who would ſeek to learn what Woman that Huzzah Queen of Ninivie was, whoſe woful Captivity the ſame Prophet Nahum likewiſe did fore-tell.

Nahum 3.8.

§. XI.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his Buildings, Madneſs, and Death.

OF the Time which this great Monarch ſpent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant; ſave thoſe which we find among the Prophecies of Daniel. Among theſe we may reckon his great Works at Babylon, wherewith he pleaſed himſelf ſo well that he brake out into theſe glorious words. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the Houſe of the Kingdom, by the might of my Power, and for the honour of my Majeſty? Surely if thoſe things be true that are by Joſephus rehearſed of him out of Beroſus and Megaſthenes, he might well delight himſelf with the contemplation of ſuch goodly and magnificent Buildings. For it is ſaid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple Wall; that beſides other ſtately Works, he raiſed thoſe huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains, which moſt ſumptuous Frame, that out-laſted all the remainder of the Aſſyrian, and all the Perſian Empire, is ſaid to have been reared, and finiſhed in fifteen days. Dan. 4. 27.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we find little elſe recorded, than that (which indeed is moſt profitable for us to conſider) his over-valuing of his own Greatneſs abaſed him unto a Condition, inferiour to the pooreſt of Men. And not undeſervedly fell theſe Judgments of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many Victories, and much happineſs in his own Life, but with a diſcovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his Dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he nevertheleſs became ſo forgetful of God, whoſe wonderful Power he had ſeen and acknowledged, that he cauſed a golden Image to be ſet up and worſhipped: ordaining a cruel Death as Reward unto them that ſhould dare to diſobey his Kingly Will and Pleaſure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Jerome hath well noted; Velox oblivio veritatis, ut qui dudum ſervum Dei quaſi Deum adoraverat, nunc ſtatuam ſibi fieri jubeat, ut ipſe quaſi Deus in ſtatuâ adoraretur: A haſty forgetfulneſs of the Truth, that he who ſo lately had worſhipped (Daniel) the ſervant of God, as if he had been God himſelf, ſhould now command a Statua to be erected unto himſelf, wherein himſelf might be worſhipped as God. From this impiety it pleaſed God to reclaim him, by the ſtrange and wonderful delivery of thoſe bleſſed Saints out of the fiery Furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refuſing to commit Idolatry, were aſſiſted by an Angel; preſerved from all harm of the Fire; looſened from their Bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and reſtored to their former Honour, by the King: who amazed at the Miracle, made a decree tending to the Honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not ſo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit anſwerable to his haſty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a Dream of the terrible Judgment hanging over his Head, which Daniel expounding, adviſed him to break off his ſin by righteouſneſs, and his iniquity by mercy towards towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his Error. Hereby it seems that Injustice and Cruelty were the Faults, for which he was threatned, but this threatning sufficed not unto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among Men (according to the tenor of the Dream and interpretation) yea compelled to dwell with the Beasts of the Field, and made to eat Grass as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in Man's Judgment, that easily it might be thought an idle Dream, and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leisure to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods Sentence. For at the end of twelve Months; walking in the Royal Palace of Babel, he was so overjoyed and transported with a vain Contemplation of his own seeming Happiness, that without all fear of Gods heavy Judgment pronounced against him, he uttered those lofty words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Majestical Works which he had reared, as well beseeming his Majestical Person. But his high Speeches were not fully ended, when a Voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the Sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Salomon and many other Princes and great ones, have taken delight in their own Buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoycing in Works of this kind (though it is hard in Joy, or any passion of the Mind to keep a just measure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mustered all their Forces to the very last Man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulness to entertain them with a sullen and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane Affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure Clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed Light, which clarifies the Soul of Man, and prediſposeth it unto the brightness of eternal Felicity; so that insolent joy, which Man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own Worth, doth above all other Passions blast our Minds, as it were with Lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent greatness, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these mala mentis gaudia; The evil joys of the Mind, were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrows, Cares, and Fears; not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely Token of Vengeance near at hand, when these unreasonable flushes of proud and vain Joy, do rage in a Mind, that should have been humbled with a just Repentance and acknowledgment of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whose Punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among Beasts in the Fields and Woods, where for seven years he lived, not only as a salvage Man, but as a salvage Beast, for a Beast he thought himself secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same Food that Beasts do; Not that he was changed in Figure external according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a Beast to other Mens Eyes, as S. Jerome in the Life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a Woman that appeared to all other Mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a Woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be into a Hind, nor made a Monster as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Jerom's Exposition of these words. At the same time was my Understanding restored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith S. Jerome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse sed mentem; When he saith that his Sense was restored unto him, he sheweth that he had not lost his humane Shape, but his Understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his Understanding, and his Estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his Life, confessing his Power and everlasting Being; that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his Works were all Truth, and his Ways righteous. Which gave Argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon joyntly.

Of EVILMERODACH.

HAving already spoken what I could of the Succession and Years of Nabuchadnezzar's Posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a War that consumed it to Ashes. He lost Ægypt by rebellion of the People, in the nineteenth year of his Reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the Accompt of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of Reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying that he died in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Ægypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fifth of Cambyses his Reign, wherein he wan Ægypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Psamennitus, the Son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Ægyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvel though they were also deceived in the length of his Reign. This is the plain Answer to this Objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and four and forty set down in stead of four and thirty, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Assyrians, and not bear himself as absolute King of Ægypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Ægypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Ægyptian Troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in Fame, and Reputation, gotten by the decayed Valour of his People, than in present Forces; or whether (as I rather think) some foil received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldened the Ægyptians to rebel against him: I will neither undertake, nor seek to define.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 1. Xenophon tells that the first Service of young Cyrus in War was under Astyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous Fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three years (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short Life, then was this Encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his Reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the War began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their Fight in former times, with other Circumstances insinuating as much, are found in Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 8. the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome Neighbour, to stand upon prouder Terms with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing Estate they durst have used. Howsoever the Quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchy. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his Party the Lydians, and all the People of the lesser Asia, with Gifts and strong Perswasions, hoping so to over-whelm his Enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain he had sought to weary out with a lingring War.

This happened after the death of Astyages, who left the World in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Ægypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of Business, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to have given the better means unto the Ægyptians, of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebel in after-ages, and set up a King within it self, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great Preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those Prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel by Esay and Jeremy.

For the Assyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their Numbers, thought to have buried the Medes, and Persians, under their thick showers of Arrows and Darts, were encountred with an Army of stout and well-trained Men, weightily armed for close Fight, by whom they were beaten in open Battel, wherein Evilmerodach was slain. So that great Frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and upheld, being shaken and grievously crackt under his unfortunate Son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew: a Man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private Conjecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the Truth, the Quality, and Death of Balthasar.

THough I have already (as it seems to me) sufficiently proved that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successour to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the Conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Niglisar or Nirigliſſoroor, and his Son Labassardach between them: as also that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some Errour might have crept into the History of those times, and thereby have brought to us a needless trouble of searching out the Truth, as it were by Candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by Day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wild among brute Beasts in the open Field: Secondly, that the suddenness of this Accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtless the Honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his Calamity pitied, and his Restitution hoped; the Prediction of Daniel finding Reputation in that Clause which promised his Recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common Reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdom, for settling the Government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with Condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossess it. In this his Rule Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of Understanding in his Father, as Protectors do the unripeness of it in young, but Herod. l. 1. reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the Insolencies, or fall into the Troubles, incident to such an Office. That he had in him very small Ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own Right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his Sister) was a Woman of an high Spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and useful Works about the River of Euphrates, and her Fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Assyrians, and amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a Woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers misgovernment, used Practices to get the Rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Niglisar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his Sisters Husband; which argues this to have been the same Woman. As for Labassardach the Son of Niglisar, if at the end of nine Months Reign he were for his lewd Conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seems that God prepared here by the way for Nebuchadnezzar's restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was slain by his Sisters Husband: for the plain words of Scripture naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers Reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthasar who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had such conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the People. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young Man that should have married his Sister, only for spight and envy to see him kill two wild Beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javeline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his Beauty, said it were a happy Woman that should be his Wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the Enemy as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of Record, but as a Coward and a Fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give Battel to them that daily took somewhat from him; yet carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a Fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful Vision, which had shewed his ruin not many hours before even whilst he was drinking in that Wine, which the Swords of his insulting Enemies drew out of him, together with his latest Blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable Reign of seventeen years he perished like a Beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose Story that of Balthasar is but an Appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the Original and first Greatness of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chief Actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it self.

Of the Race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governors having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire, Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the Race of Arbaces dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions as well of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the House of Achæmenes, the Princes of which Blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third Son of Japhet; that they had Kings soon after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found Record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, slain by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians; I take the List and Number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	Who reigned	28 years.
Sosarmus		30 years.
Medidus		40 years.
Cardiceas		13 years.
Diocles		53 years.
Phraortes		24 years.
Cyaxares		32 years.
Astyages		38 years.
Darius Medus

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and and Babylonian Empire alſo was during his own life. For we find in Daniel that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom being threeſcore and two years old. And further what Officers it pleaſed him to ſet over the Kingdom. And ſo was it prepheſied by Iſaiah long before: Behold I will ſtir up the Medes againſt them, &c. And by Jeremy, The Lord hath raiſed up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpoſe is againſt Babel to deſtroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verſe, Prepare againſt her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. Theſe Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking Authority from Diodor, Caſtor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to Reign, which alſo agreeth with Strabo, where he ſaith, That as the Medes were ſubjugated by the Perſians, ſo before that, both the Babylonians and Aſſyrians were maſtered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Juſtin, and Herodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was tranſlated from the Medes to the Perſians.

HOW the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not ſufficiently cleared by Hiſtorians: but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of thoſe who give the Conqueſt of Babel to the Perſian only. For ſome there are who deny that Aſtyages had any other Succeſſor than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Cteſias on the contrary ſide affirmeth that Cyrus was no way deſcended from Aſtyages (whom he calleth Aſtygas or Apama) but only that having vanquiſhed him in Battel, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Cteſias often cited and ſeldom followed, and himſelf ſometimes very juſtly reproved of wilful untruth.

Viginier a diligent and learned Hiſtorian of this Age, produceth many probable reaſons that Aſtyages had no ſuch Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Juſtin, Strabo, Plato, Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and before them Caſtor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who do not find any ſuch Succeſſor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Juſtin Martyr, Lactantius, Euſebius, S. Jerome, or S. Auguſtine, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Succeſſor to Aſtyages than Cyrus.

Yet ſeeing that this manner of Argument, ab authoritate negativè, doth never inforce conſent; we may be the bolder (all this great Liſt of Noble Writers by him alledged notwithſtanding) to affirm that either Aſtyages himſelf muſt have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the courſe of time; or elſe to give him ſome other Succeſſor, according to Joſephus, and Xenophon, the ſame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifeſt, and without diſpute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was abſolute Lord of that Conqueſt, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and ſubject to his Authority; the ſtrength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Perſians, with other the Vaſſals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certain that the honour of that great Victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the inſtrument preordained and forenamed by God himſelf, not only for this action, but for the delivery of his Church; a greater work in the Eyes of God, than the ſubverſion of any State or Monarchy, how powerful ſoever.

And it may well be thought, that the Soldiers imployed in that ſervice did rather aſcribe the glory to him that was the beſt Man of War, than to the Median, who was greateſt in Riches and Power. All which alſo falling upon Cyrus by ſucceſſion, and continuing in his Poſterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among Prophane Hiſtorians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becauſe he was old, and did nothing in Perſon; as alſo becauſe he ſoon after quitted the World, and left all to Cyrus, who was poſſeſt of whatſoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any ſuch King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Hiſtorians, they took all things from the relations of the Perſians, who gave to Cyrus all the praiſe of a moſt excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the firſt, fifth, and ſixth Chapters of his Prophecies, makes it plain that himſelf not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that eſtate to the firſt of Cyrus, which being the year of Daniel's death, could not have been diſtinguiſhed from the Reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned joyntly; neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus's permiſſion, conſidering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War which the Medes and Perſians made with joynt Forces upon the Aſſyrians and others.

THESE Teſtimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our underſtanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of theſe Wars: The cauſe whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Aſſyrian had inlarged his Empire with Victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his ſubjection, there ſhould not then be left any Nation adjoyning able to make head againſt him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the Field threeſcore thouſand Foot, and above ten thouſand Horſe, to which the Forces of Perſia being joyned made an exceeding ſtrong Army.

The Aſſyrian conſidering the ſtrength of ſuch a Neighbour, invited Cræſus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in Men and Treaſure, and with him other Lords of Aſia the leſs to his aſſiſtance, alledging that thoſe Eaſtern Nations were very powerful, and ſo firmly conjoyned by League and many many Alliances, that it would not be eaſie, no not poſſible, for any one Nation to reſiſt them. With theſe incitements ſtrengthned with great preſents, he drew to himſelf ſo many adherents as he compounded an Army of two hundred thouſand Foot, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe; of which, ten thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot were led by Cræſus, who had great cauſe of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them againſt his Father Alyattes; but this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Perſian Forces, utterly broken; upon which Defeat the Aſſyrian King being alſo ſlain, ſo many of the Aſſyrians revolted, as Babylon it ſelf could not longer be aſſured without the ſuccours of Mercenaries, waged with great ſumms of Mony out of Aſia the leſs, Ægypt, and elſewhere. Which new gathered Forces were alſo ſcattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, poſſeſt himſelf of a great part of the leſſer Aſia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræſus himſelf was alſo made priſoner.

The attempt of Babylon following ſoon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Siſters Son, prevailed againſt Balthaſar, as in due time ſhall be ſet down.

Thoſe Perſians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbred thirty thouſand Foot-men, of which a thouſand were armed Gentlemen, the reſt of the common ſort were Archers, or ſuch as uſed the Dart and the Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this Argument, as it is true, that he deſcribed in Cyrus the pattern of a moſt Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition: So it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and groſs of his Narration was founded upon meer Hiſtorical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writer, that in every ſpeech and circumſtance he hath preciſely tied himſelf to the Phraſe of the Speaker, or nature of the occaſion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the ſame to the times and perſons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Politick diſcourſe, and examining but the Hiſtory of things done, it will eaſily appear that Xenophon hath handled his undertaken ſubject in ſuch ſort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any ſort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The eſtate of the Medes and Perſians in times foregoing this great War.

FOR it is commonly agreed upon, that Achæmenes, the Son of Perſes being Governor of Perſia, did aſſociate himſelf with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that Rebellion againſt Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the Victory obtained, held for himſelf the Dominion of thoſe Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Aſſyrians; as alſo that they conveighed over the ſame honour and power to their Poſterity; which in Media was not abſolutely Regal, but with ſome reſtraint limited, until ſuch time as Dejoces took upon him the full Authority and Majeſty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the Reign of Dejoces, are uſually accounted about an hundred and forty years, in the laſt ſixty whereof there reigned in Aſſyria mighty Princes, namely Salmanaſſar and his Succeſſors, whoſe great atchievements in Syria and elſewhere witneſs, that the Medes and Perſians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offenſive War againſt thoſe victorious Kings, it being alſo probable that the League continued as yet between theſe the Succeſſors of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly ſhared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Dejoces to the firſt of Aſtyages, there paſt above ninety years, in which if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Perſia, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many Victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Aſia, it had been but an unadviſed enterpriſe of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to have waſted themſelves againſt the Syrians and Ægyptians, leaving ſo able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Perſia, and that the Perſians themſelves were not Maſters of Suſiana in Nabuchodonoſor's time, it is manifeſt in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonians in Suſa or Suſan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares or Aſtyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Cræſus, which after ſome ſix years diſpute was compounded.

How the affairs of Perſia ſtood in ſo many ages, I do not find any memory. It ſeemeth that the roughneſs of the mountainous Country which they then poſſeſt, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more ſecurity than fame: For if their Kings, being the Poſterity of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatneſs which they afterward obtained would not have ſuffered any forgetfulneſs thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of theſe Wars and the ſtate of thoſe Countries to be very conſonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, ſo it appears, that the Race of Achæmenes held the Principality of Perſia from Father to Son for many deſcents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the Father of Cyrus was King of Perſia: than to thoſe that make him a mean Man, and ſay, that Aſtyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in Marriage, to the end that her Son (whoſe Nativity he feared) might be diſabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers ignobility.

For what cauſe of grief could it be to Aſtyages, that the Son of his Daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No; it was more likely, that upon ſuch a Prophecy his love to his Grand-child ſhould have encreaſed, and his care been the greater to have married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I think the deviſer of the miſchief intended againſt Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confeſs, That the Line of the Achæmenidæ was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his Proſperity did thence derive himſelf, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, nor had they been the Vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeventh of Herodotus deriveth himſelf.

Of the Achæmenidæ there were two Races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue Male failed in his two Sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This Royal Family is thus ſet down by the learned Reineccius.

Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes and Atoſſa, who, married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artyſtona and other Daughters.
Cambyſes had

Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis ſlain by his Brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond were thoſe ſeven great Princes of Perſia, who having overthrown the uſurped Royalty of the Magi, choſe from among themſelves Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes King.

This Kingdom of Perſia was firſt known by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the Son of Sem, and the People therein inhabiting Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Joſephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometime from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſæi; which Maguſæi, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for thoſe who were afterward called the Magi, or wiſe Men. So do the Greeks, among many other their ſayings of them, affirm, That the Perſians were anciently written Artæi, and that they called themſelves Cephenes. But that they were Elamitæ, Moſes and the Prophets, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Eſdras in many places confirm: which alſo S. Jerome upon Jeremy the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eight and twentieth, and in his Hebrew queſtions approveth, ſaying, Elam à quo Elamitæ Principes Perſidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And yet this City, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander, at the requeſt of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

CHAP. III.

Of CYRUS.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name and firſt actions.

AS touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo ſaith, That the ſame was taken from a River which watereth Perſia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the firſt of that name; Herodotus otherwiſe; and that Cyrus ſignifieth a Father in the Perſian Tongue, and therefore ſo intituled by the People.

Strab. l. 15.

It is true that for his Juſtice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any ſuch ſignification, I think it be miſtaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to ſay as the Sun, in the ſame Language. Howſoever it be, yet the Prophet Iſaiah, almoſt two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that name, Thus ſaith the Lord unto Cyrus his anointed, &c.

Plut. in vit. Artax.

Before the Conqueſt of Babylon, the Victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conqueſt of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto ſubject, together with the taking of Cræſus himſelf, are not recounted by Euſebius, Oroſius, and others, but placed among his later atchievements, whoſe opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reaſons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that laſt War againſt Cræſus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious Victory which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

Athen. l. 14. c. 17.

The

The former of which might have been used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The later seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Crœsus the King of Lydia, who made War upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoken somewhat of Crœsus, of his Race and Predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to Prophane Authors known) was Lydus, the Son of Atys: which Family extinguished, the Kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty Generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his fair Wife naked to Gyges his favorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to Ardys his Son, who was Father to Sadyattes, the Father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Crœsus: which five Kings, of a third Race, enjoyed that Kingdom an hundred and seventy years. Halyattes the Father of Crœsus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a War against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerful, and maintained it six years, a Peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Herod. l. 1. p. 34, & 5.

Astyages, the Son of Cyaxares, and Grandfather to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenis, Crœsus Sister, whom he married.

But Crœsus so far enlarged his Dominions after his Fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in Territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Ægyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joyned Phœnicia, Palestina, and Ægypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his own life.

But Crœsus, notwithstanding the Men and Treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastred Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possest by the Greeks in Asia the less, adjoyning to Lydia; gave Law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforc'd the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their City with Diana's Girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenæus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a signal Victory which Crœsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his Allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacea: All which he performed in fourteen year.

Athen. l. 14. c. 17.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus's fame, doubting also, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perillous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with marvellous rich Gifts, what success he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this Riddle, Crœsus passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the Devil being doubtful of the success, paid him with Merchandize of both sides like, and might be inverted either way to the ruin of Persia, or of his own Lydia.

§. III.

Crœsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEreupon Crœsus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus's fortunes, if he could, despised all the Arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a People not covered with the soft Silk of Worms, but with the hard Skins of Beasts; not fed with such Meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of Water, not of Wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his loss appear of all things which the World hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid Counsel, Crœsus having prepared a powerful Army, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all means to surprize or force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for out of doubt, Crœsus as he excelled any Prince of that age in Riches and Ability; so was he not under any in territory and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the Gods, because they favoured a Disturber and Usurper of the Commonweal against him who fought for the Roman liberty, That Kingdoms and Commonweals had their encrease and period from Divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Crœsus Prosperity at hand, the Leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the Flower and first Spring. The God of all Power, and not Admetis Herdsman, Apollo, had given date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers Skirmishes, the the Persians and Lydians began to joyn in gross Troops: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the Day, so when the dark veil of Night had hidden each Army from the others view, Cræsus doubting what success the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the Field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regal Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus's approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Soldiers, and sent the Troops of his sundry Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Cræsus his proceeding, he so measured his Marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Cræsus had disposed his Army to their wintring Garrisons: when being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Army: wherein Cræsus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Guards, after fourteen days Siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cræsus having now neither Arms to fight, nor Wings to flie, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himself into the heap and miserable Multitude of his Vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common Persons vanquished, had not a Son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremity of passion and fear enabled) cried out to the Soldiers to spare Cræsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoiled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in Fetters, & set on the top of a great and high heap of Wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the discourse which he had had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence: but urged again, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many Men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no Man could discern himself for happy indeed, till his end.

In communi calamitate suam quisq; habet fortunam. Curt.

Memoriam metus perimit: timor vocis est incitamentum, &c. Solin. c. 7.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune and his own mortality, he commanded his Ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence to save Cræsus, and to conduct him to his presence: which done, Cyrus demanded of him, who it was that had perswaded him? or what self-reason had conducted him to invade his Territory, and to make him of a Friend an Enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my unprosperous destiny (the Gracian God flattering therewithal my ambition) that were the inverters and conductors of Cræsus War against Cyrus.

Homo qui in homine calamitoso misericors est meminit sui. Cass.

Cyrus being pierc'd with Cræsus's answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his Companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Qua non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the real difference discerned between that behaviour which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A Thief sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evil.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Cræsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have been burnt alive. It may well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an Heroical Prince, thought an intent so cruel fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbeseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that nearness of Alliance might withhold Cyrus (had he been otherwise vitious) from so cruel a purpose against his Grand mothers Brother. Howsoever it was, the Moral part of the Story hath given credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it pass for currant, though the trust reposed in Cræsus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Army over Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræsus to accompany and advise his Son Cambyses, Governor of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyses into Ægypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I do not find.

But in this time the Races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the World took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Cræsus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then living upon Earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it seems, that ten whole years did pass between his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which nevertheless I do not think to have been wholly occupied in provision for the Assyrian War, but rather to have been spent in in settling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments, of a War made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Crœsus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battel overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soon after the departure of the victorious Army, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the less, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crœsus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the less, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who resolvedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it self, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to divert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the work upon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength unto the taking of that City, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with Waters unfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a City so well fortified and man'd, was, in cutting off all supplies of victuals, and other necessaries: whereof though the Town was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twenty years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soon appear, and vanquish the resolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the Besiegers were likely to endure much travel, and all in vain, if they did not keep strict watch and strong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to do, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured unto their Commander: The consideration whereof ministred unto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having been their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyn with them, if occasion were offered than to use much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus; who had, as it were yesterday, laid upon their necks the galling yoke of servitude. Whilst the besieged were pleating themselves in this deceitful and vain gladness, that is the ordinary fore-runner of sudden calamity, Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong and constant, and inventive, devised, by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed, he stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain banks or heads un-cut, between the main River which surrounded the City, and his own Trenches.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 7.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weakness within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous Feast, publick Plays, and other Pastimes; and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobility, besides his Wives, Curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were either sufficient, not only for all needful uses, but even for jollity and excess; or because he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distresses, were well near broken; or in honour of Bel his most reverenced Idol; or that it was his Birth or Coronation-day; or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equal, but (using Daniel's words) he lifted himself up against the Lord of Heaven: for he and his Princes, Wives and Concubines, made carousing cups of the vessels of God, in contempt of whom, he praised his own Puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Brass, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit stultitia invasibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos laudare? How great a foolishness was it (saith St. Hierom) drinking in golden Cups, to praise gods of Wood and Stone? While Balthasar was in this sort triumphing, and his brains well filled with vapours, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite unto him, certain words which he understood not: wherewith so great a fear and amazement seised him, as the joynts of his loyns were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion, when he had in some part recovered, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment, the Queen hearing what had past, and of the King's amazement, after reverence done, used this speech: There is a Man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy Father, light and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor, thy Father, the King (I say) thy Father made chief of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and South sayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the Interpretation.

Dan. 5. 6.

This Queen, Josephus takes for the Grandmother Origen and Theodoret, for the Mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth that she was not any of the King's Wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing, and banquetting, she came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembred well what he had done in the days of Nabuchodonosor, Grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his Religion and divine gifts.

Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Joseph. Ant. 10.

When Daniel was brought to the King's presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to read and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a fat different stile from that he used towards his Grandfather: for, the evil which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies; but to this King (whose neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy rewards to thy self, and give thy gifts to another; yet will I read the writing unto the King, and shew him the interpretation. Which, before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of God's just Judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, whereof the King and all his Wise men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting God's goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and understanding, so upon the acknowledgement of God's infinite Power he restored him to both. This King, notwithstanding, lifted himself up against the same God; and presuming both to abuse those Vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and worshiped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brass, Iron, Stone and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene Tekel Upharsin, gave the King knowledge, that God hath numbred the time of his Kingdom, and finished it; That he was weighed in the ballance of God's Justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

Dan. 5. 18, 19, 20.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his espyals, according to Xenophon; or inspired by God himself, whose ensign he followed in this War, found the time and opportunity to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no less filled with the vapors of Wine, than their hearts with the fear of God's judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channel running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unless they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthasar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the King's Palace; which having easily forced, they rushed into the Chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the Prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Esay two hundred years before this subversion; who in his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seen the great and unfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecy of this place he beginneth in these words; Come down, and sit in the dust, O Virgin Daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And again, Sit still, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdoms. For, though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor, and the Chaldeans, to punish the Idolatty of the Judeans; yet Esay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the Name, and the Remnant, and the Son, and the Nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: whosoever joyneth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their Wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this Victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posterity after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

Cap. 47.

Isa. 14. To wit, Evilmerodach and Balthasar

The greatness and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierom, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three days after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compass at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty Miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that six Charriots mights pass in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenteth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty Mile and one Furlong, but finds the Wall far under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickness but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the same with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourscore furlongs circle; the thickness of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regal cubit. For entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Brass, with Posts and Hooks to hang them on of the same metal: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princess and Glory of Kingdoms.

Isa. 47. 13

But when Cyrus had won her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all Wise Kings that are desirous to establish a royal Power to themselves and their posterity.

§ VI.

The end of Cyrus.

THe last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an encounter between the Persians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battel, beat the Persians Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words, words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill and satiate thy self.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, Father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War, which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh Book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith, he defeated the son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorrhæus King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three days after.

Cte. l. 15. hist. part.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasagardes, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have been this: O vir, quicunquees, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi nè invideas, O thou Man, whosoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou should'st come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

Strab. l. 15.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

Qu. Curt

Xen. pæd. 8 Zon. l. 1. p. 20.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such hast to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, that Cyrus died aged, and in peace: and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons Cambyses and Smerdis; or, after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and, after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others, of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his Sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia, and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecy of Esay, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jews from their Captivity, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Jerusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of God's power, used for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an instrument of God's goodness, and a willing advancer of his Kingdom upon Earth; which must last for ever, though Heaven and Earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAving therefore spoken of his great Victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Authour of them and of all goodness: I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jews should return again into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and ten years captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the Grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldea under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jesus or Josua the Son of Josadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

1 Esd. 2. 2 Esd. 7. Phil. in bre.

1 Esd. 3. 3. Esd 5.

But no sooner did the Jews begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoyning, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governors of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Provincial Lieutenants, and other officers of less place, but Cambyses himself; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authours make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyses did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: they may herein resolve themselves out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindred all the time of King Cyrus's life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was 46. years in setting up, having received so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the natural and politick courses which moved Cambyses to withstand his Father's Decree, as well while he Governed under him, as when himself became sole and Soveraign Monarch, we shall find them in that Epistle remembred by Esdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellours in Phenicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

Esd. 1. c. 4.

But that which for that preſent ſeemed the moſt forcible impediment, was, that Cambyſes having in his reſolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jews were deſcended of thoſe Nations, becauſe they iſſued thence under Moſes, when they conquered Judea; their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the ſame diſturbance to Cambyſes's Conqueſt, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonoſor, and other Kings of Babylon. For, as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the houſe of Iſrael. Ezek. c. 29

But it is to be underſtood, as Codoman and others have obſerved, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counſellours and Governours of Phœnicia complained againſt the Jews, did not precede, but ſucceed Darius Hyſtaſpes, as in the ſixth and ſeventh Chapters of Eſdras it is made plain: and alſo that thoſe Governours (whoſe Epiſtle ſheweth as much) did not withſtand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and encloſing of the City, as by the reaſons given in the ſaid Epiſtle, and by the King's Anſwer, it is evident.

Alſo in the ſixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verſe, the Kings are named in order as they Governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finiſhed it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Iſrael, and by the commandment of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahſhaſte Kings of Perſia. Laſtly, in the ſeventh of Ezra it is written; Now after theſe things, in the reign of Artahſhaſte King of Perſia: which was as much as to ſay, after the finiſhing of the Temple in Darius's time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the ſecond of Eſdras is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the re-building of the City and Temple of Jeruſalem. Which action though proſpered by the hand of God, was very ſlowly purſued by the men whom it moſt concerned, but firſt ſet on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his form and manner of Government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death, he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldeſt Son Cambyſes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger ſon to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Caduſia; and then died, after he had reigned (ſaith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Juſtine) but thirty.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Iſſue: and whether Atoſſa were his Daughter, or (as ſome think) were the ſame with Queen Heſter.

CYrus had iſſue two ſons, Cambyſes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atoſſa, Meroe, and Artyſtona: Cteſias addeth to theſe, Amytis. Atoſſa and Meroe their brother Cambyſes married; Artyſtona, Darius Hiſtaſpes obtained; ſo did he Atoſſa, Cambyſes being dead: who (as ſome Writers have ſuppoſed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Tranſlation calleth a Macedonian) had againſt the Jews, though the opinion of Joſephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be underſtood, how Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, ſhould have been Eſther, whoſe Hiſtory ſeems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes or Xerxes. The deſire of Atoſſa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Perſia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby ſhe thought her husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give aſſent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the near ſound of the two names, Atoſſa and Hadaſſa, (by the latter of which Eſther was alſo called) makes them to have been one perſon. For though it be true that Eſther concerning her parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codoman's inference is nothing probable, that ſhe ſhould therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Eſther did at length diſcover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Hiſtories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and eſpecially the Nobility, muſt needs have underſtood the truth: who nevertheleſs did ſo well know the parentage of Atoſſa, that for her ſake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her ſon Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder Brother, againſt whom alſo he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of theſe things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The Eſtate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

§. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Perſian Kings.

OF the Succeſſors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Perſian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metaſthenes, who hath numbred the Perſian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus joyntly.	2	years.
Cyrus alone.	22
Priſcus Artaxerxes.	20
Darius Longimanus.	37
Darius Nothus.	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon.	55
Artaxerxes Ochus.	26
Arſes, or Arſames.	4
Darius, the laſt, conquered by Alexander.	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But in this Catalogue Metaſthenes hath left out Cambyſes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Aſſuerus, for the immediate ſucceſſor of Cyrus; in place (ſaith Melanchon) of Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes: for Metaſthenes as Melanchon conjectureth, doth not account Cambyſes in the Catalogue, becauſe his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a ſecond Opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but four Perſian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, ond Beroaldus, have alſo a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheleſs Euſebius, and moſt of the Latins follow, and ſo Krentzheim, who hath fully anſwered; and as I take it, refuſed all the former Authours varying from that account. For in this ſort do the Greeks marſhal the Perſian Kings with the times of their Reigns. Chro. Kren. fo. 135.

Cyrus

Melanct. gives Cyrus but 29.	Cyrus in all.	30

	Arſames.	3
Melanct. 26. Melanct. 4	Darius the laſt.	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have ſaid) the moſt Chronologers, and the beſt learned approve. Theſe Perſian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his hiſtorical Animadverſions, hath gathered the places; finding firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, ch. 36. verſ. 22, 23. Ezra, 1. ch. 1. verſ. 1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly, Cambyſes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the Marginal Commentator upon the Geneva underſtands that place; but under correction, miſtakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtaſpes was an enemy to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elſewhere proved.

Thirdly, Is Darius Hyſtaſpes found in Ezra the firſt, c. 4. v. 5. who in the ſixth verſe is alſo named Ahaſſuerus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainly foretold and deſcribed, and the great War which he ſhould make againſt the Greeks by Daniel alſo remembred.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeven, who is alſo called Arthaſaſtha, c. 4. l. 1. Ezra v. 7. and chap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. v. 24. and cap. 5. v. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. v. 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. cap. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames: for Darius the laſt, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſon of Atoſſa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Euſebius, with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Perſian King with their Acts, to ſome certain Olympiad; As the War of Aſtyages (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Crœſus his Father) to the nine and fortyeth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus's reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invaſion of Egypt by Cambyſes to the third year of threeſcore and third Olympiad; and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement between ſeveral forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this hiſtorical demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomical computation of Ptolemy, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonaſſar. And the Æra of Nabonaſſar began on the ſix and twentieth of February: which, conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the firſt year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greek Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolemy, we ſhall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

Alm. l. 3. c. 6.

For Ptolemy reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonaſſar to the ſixteenth of July, in the ſeventh year of Cambyſes.

The Greeks, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes's ſeventh year, in the firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolomy the two hundred and ſix and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſerving the differences of Nabonaſſar's Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Joſephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, ſaving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the deſtruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well ſtand with it.

Laſtly, The diſagreement and confuſed accompts of thoſe that follow the other Catalogue of the Perſian Kings formerly rehearſed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being conſtant in it ſelf, accordeth alſo with the computation of other Hiſtorians, and Aſtronomers, and likewiſe with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyſes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth, give the Empire of Perſia to Cambyſes, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, ſaving the deſire to increaſe the greatneſs of his Empire: whereof he was poſſeſt in his Father's time, while Cyrus made War in the North. Cteſias with others give him a longer Reign than agreeth with the Græcian accompt before received.

In the fifth year of his ſole reign, and in the third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Euſebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Pſammeniticus, he not only cauſed him to be ſlain, but alſo did put to death all his kindred and dependents, with the moſt of his children. Lib. 2. c. 2. Her. l. 3. p. 83, 84, 85.

Herodotus and Cteſias give for cauſe of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyſes) that when he ſent to Amaſis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amaſis preſented him with Nitetis the Daughter of Apries his predeceſſor, which Cambyſes diſdained.

Howſoever it were; true it is, that Cambyſes gathered an Army fit for ſuch an enterprize, and cauſed the ſame to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amaſis died, and left Pſammeniticus, whom Cteſias called Amyrteus, his ſucceſſor; who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the beſt Copies of Herodotus) but ſix months, though other Chronologers give him ſix years.

But how long ſoever he held the Crown, in one battle he loſt it, and was himſelf taken priſoner.

It is ſaid that Cambyſes, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only ſpare life to the conquered King, but that he alſo truſted him with the Government of Egypt, and that upon ſome revolt, or ſuſpicion thereof, he cauſed him to be ſlaughtered.

But the race of this King was not ſo extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who cauſed the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

to

That Psammeniticus, was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custom both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the Worms might not devour them. The* Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romans ever consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his own to be devoured by that Element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himself had untombed the carcase of Cajus Marius after his death. Her. l. 3. Plin. l. 6. c. 54. Strab. & Just. l. 1. pag. 87, 88. Her. l. 3. Sen. l. 7.

§. III.

The rest of Cambyses his Acts.

After this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyses sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Evelthon King thereof to acknowledge him who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia to overturn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devil, in defence of his Oratory, raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of the Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choaked and over-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troops had tryed, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over-men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old English Proverb, Go, saith the King; Stay, saith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Æthiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slain: a deed very commendable had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in service of him that only is, and liveth. But soon afterwards, when in a dream it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the Royal Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave in charge to his favourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Sisters, contrary to the Persian Laws, he committed a most causeless and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himself with child, because she bewailed the death of her Brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyses, That because his Predecessours observed religiously the Ordinances of the Empire, he assembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any Law among the Persians that did permit the Brother to marry his own Sister; it being his own intent so to do: the Judges (who had always either Laws or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customs, that it was always left to the will of the Persian Kings, to do what best pleased themselves; and so as Nauclerus terms it, invenerunt occasionem: that is as much as to say, The Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the King's private satisfaction, he caused Sisamnus, one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be flayed alive, for an unjust judgement given, and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement-seat. After which, bestowing the Father's Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the same partiality deserved the same punishment.

Her. p. 89, 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the Son of his beloved Praxaspes, was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his condition, Praxaspes answered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praise from all men, only it was by many observed, that he took more than usual delight in the taste of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he used this replication: And, Are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me, that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I miss the mark, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the stroke, Cambyses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying instead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes thou mayst resolve thy self, that I have not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such Report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed, that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanis and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domestical affairs, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the King's Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest themselves of the Empire, he made all hast towards Persia; and in mounting hastily on horse-back, his sword dis-sheathing, pierced his own Thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he soon after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven months in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

Curt. l. 4.

In Cambyses the Male-Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierom gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a Son called Orontes: who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward, in memory of the Princes death, called Orontes.

Zon. Cur. 2. p. 117.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Sister Meroe.

§. IV.

Of the Inter-regnum between Cambyses and Darius.

Cyrus and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapa's, or Provincial Governours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabysus, Asphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achæmenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together surprized and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Justin) Intaphernes, and Asphatines were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Otanes (one of the Seven) did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobility and Cities should confederate, and by just Laws defend their Liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being, as it seemed, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatness it self, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without Judgement.

Megabysus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgement, run into business and affairs with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous, because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen, that the discord of many Rulers hath enforc'd the election of One Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, far safer to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government, by God established and made prosperous. And to avoid partiality, it was accorded that the morning following, these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back and on him the Kingdom should be conferred, whose Horse, after the Sun-rising, should first neigh or bray. In the Evening, after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarus, who, in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who, as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King. Her. 3. p. 100, 101.

Plato, in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

CHAP. V.

Of Darius the Son of Hystaspes.

§ I.

Of Darius his Lineage,

Darius was descended of the Ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achemenide, of which Cyrus the Great was the lineal successor. For in this sort Herodotus derives him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had Tispius, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was Father of Arsames, the Father of Hystaspes, the Father of Darius, Sir-named Celus, the Father of Xerxes.

Curt. l. 4. Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the wars against the Scythians: at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caused him to be sent into Persia; others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, Her. l. 3. and either by the neighing of his Horse, or, as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus's Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his Wives.

* Herodot. pag. 154. pag. 130. pag. 101. & 202. pag. 108, 109. Her. l. 6. p. 180. pag. 186. Aegu. Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had, besides Darius, these three sons, who were great Commanders in the War which Darius made in Asia the less, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Ataynes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes, from the second Grecian War. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Army of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius Artaxastre, his Cosin german.

Reineccius gives to Hystaspes five sons, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two Daughters. p. 179, p. 200, 204. & p. 213, 285, 286. p. 214, 254. De Reg. Persar. fol. 32.

§ II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equal Laws whereby his Subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave access to all his Subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people which had not been accustomed in Cyrus's time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyses made afar off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave gave him that credit, as they truſted him with the diſpoſition and commandment of their greateſt forces; which when Zopyrus had obtained, after ſome ſmall colourable overthrows given to the Perſians upon ſallies, he delivered the City into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty months.

Her. l. 3.

§. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

IN the ſecond year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Jeruſalem ſhould go on, and commanded that the ſame ſhould be finiſhed at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of thoſe Provinces which are ſituate between Euphrates and the Phœnician, and midland Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindred the work in Cambyſes his time, Darius gave commandment that they ſhould not thenceforth come near unto Jeruſalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they ſhould withdraw themſelves, and get them far off till all were finiſhed and at an end. In the old Latin it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your ſelves far from them, In our Engliſh, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

Ezra c. 6.

He alſo made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whoſoever ſhould thenceforth hinder the ſetting up of the Temple of God, that his houſe ſhould be torn down, and the diſturber hanged on the Gallows made of the Timber thereof. He alſo in the ſame Decree maketh invocation to God; That hath cauſed his Name to dwell there (to) deſtroy all Kings and people that put their hands to alter, and to deſtroy this houſe of God which is in Jeruſalem, &c. In four years after which Decree (the Jews being really furniſhed with money and all things neceſſary from Darius) the Temple was in all finiſhed, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the ſixth year of Darius Hyſtaſpes, and in the two and fortieth after their firſt return.

§. IV.

Of Darius his Scythian War.

AFter the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whoſe King Juſtin calleth Lauthinus, and ſaith, that Darius undertook this War againſt him, becauſe he refuſed him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of ſmall Veſſels over the River Iſter or Danubius, and gave the cuſtody of the ſame in charge (among others of Aſia the leſs) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perſwaded the Aſian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the ſame was reſiſted by Hiſtiæus Prince of Milet, a City of Ionia, which Nation, being a Colony of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Country, becauſe they joyned themſelves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good ſlaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Maſter, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of ſhaking off their bondage, when they were preſented with as fair an occaſion of liberty as could have been deſired. For the great Army of Darius entring the Deſart Country called Beſſarabia, found in it neither people to reſiſt them, nor any ſuſtenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their poſterity, at this day, all horſe-men, uſing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graſiers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Paſture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but uſed for Houſes the Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children. Theſe Waggons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removeable at their pleaſure. Neither hath the Emperour himſelf, called now the great Chrim, any other City than ſuch as Agora (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himſelf, and waſted his proviſion in thoſe deſolate Regions, wherein he found neither ways to direct him, victuals to refreſh him, nor any houſes, fruitful trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himſelf might make uſe of, or by deſtroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet ſetting a good face upon a bad game, he ſent brave meſſages to the Scythian, bidding him to ceaſe his flight, and either to make trial of his valour and fortune in plain battle; Or, if he acknowledged himſelf the weaker, then to yeild by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Perſians uſed to demand, as a ſign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphical anſwer; ſending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouſe, and five Arrows: which dumb ſhew Darius interpreting by his own wiſh, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein thoſe creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the ſeven Princes, who had ſlain the Magi, conſtrued their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Perſians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the Earth, for elſe ye ſhall not eſcape our Arrows. And this interpretation was ſoon verified by the Scythians themſelves, who aſſailed the Perſian Camp, drave the horſe-men into the Trenches, and vexed the Army with continual Allarums day and night; were ſo fearleſs of this great Monarch, and ſo little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his ſight, they did not forbear the paſtime of courſing a Hare, which they had ſtarted by chance. By this boldneſs of theirs, Darius was ſo diſcouraged, that he forſook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were ſick, and weak behind him, and ſo with all ſpeed marched away towards the River Iſter. He was purſued hardly by the Scythians, who miſt him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perſwaded the Ionians to depart, aſſuring them that the Perſian King ſhould never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hiſtiæus the Mileſian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewiſe fail to meet, when they returned from Iſter to ſeek him out.

Some actions of the Perſians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

DArius having thus eſcaped out of Scythia, determined the invaſion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabaſus, who maſtered the Paonians, and tranſplanted them, and poſſeſt Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being alſo ſoon after ſubjected, and added to the Perſian Empire by Otanes, the Son of Syſamnes, whom Cambyſes had excoriated for falſe Judgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and ▪ Cardia likewiſe taken in from the Perſian, who having now reduced duced under his obeysance, the best part of Thrace, did send his Ambassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soveraignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemn and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed upon their greatness and many Victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those noble Ladies, as Alexander the King's Son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his Father to withdraw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the Feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder: But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his Sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principal Commander of Darius's forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that Tempest, which threatned to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the less, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. IV.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsall of the Government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOw the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after, between the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which City endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius's invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave fire to those wars, which never could be throughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Persian Monarchy, Persepolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadful, as in the pride of their greatness, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently Governed, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, and in several times among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperours, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient polity under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former Government from Monarchial to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Solon, and others who are the less to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after ages derived unto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government; the State of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchy by Pisistratus the Son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plausible for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in General. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and feigned that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a Guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadel of Athens, he made himself Lord of the Town; Hegesistratus being then governour. But the Citizens, who in every change of Government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchy, could so ill brook this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to fly the Town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his Tyranny, founded upon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soon after well re-edified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did, (as is the usual practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which Alliance the Family of the Alcmæonidæ, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerful, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonidæ, and especially Megacles, being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so far, that Pisistratus (upon the first discovery of their intent) perceived no other remedy for his affairs, than to withdraw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he again recovered the principality of Athens after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, saith Elianus, but as Justin hath it, four and thirty; accounting the time belike as well before, as after his several expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son six and thirty years; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his successors, his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineal successors of a Natural Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his Brother Hipparchus, was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And, though Hipparchus was charged with unnatural lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent virtues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers, and authors of that scandal. Hippias fearing that this enterprize upon his Brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reveal her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait Amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose Son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his Brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himself, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clistines, one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practice their delivery: who, calling to his assistance the banished Alcmæonidæ, together with an Army of the Lacedemonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by his composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarquing himself took Land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia governed by Æantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty years before the battel of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprize upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus far I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better, the Causes and Motives of this War: Whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him solicit and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

§ II.

Of the Ionian Rebellion which was the principal cause of the Wars ensuing between Greece and Persia.

ANother, and a strong motive to this expedition was the Ionick War, breaking out into Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enjoyed their Liberty about 500 years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Crœsus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Persia.

But as it is the custom of Nations half-conquered (witness Ireland) to rebel again upon every advantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Grecians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seek by all means possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spur them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the Government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose only might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutiful affection they had well declared, when Darius, being in great extremity, they used all means to deliver him and his Army (that otherwise had been lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of service Histiæus the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own desires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came so to pass, that Darius being more fearful of the harm that Histiæus (being powerful and crafty) might do to him in the future, than mindful of the good which he had already received at his hand, found means to carry him along to Susa, where he detained him with all kind usage of a friend, yet kept such good espial upon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Histiæus had subtilty enough to discover the King's purpose, which ill agreed with his own desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one fair City, having a small Territory, than to sit and feast at the great King's Table, and hear the Counsels by which a large Empire was managed; being himself an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow upon himself.

Where-

Wherefore he bethought himself of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which, if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deal as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, advising him to stir up some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who having failed in an enterprize upon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in fear of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befal him, as one that had wasted the King's treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsel: and the better to draw the whole Countrey of Ionia into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did set Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants, (of whom some he took and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admiral in the enterprize of Naxos, he had surprized in his first breaking out, together with the principal Officers and Captains; so that now he thought himself able to deal with the great King's Forces, lying thereabout either by Land or Sea. But likely it was, that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, unless he were able to raise an Army that might hold the field which the Ionians alone were insufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having assayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fifty Talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedemonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with better success besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Ambassadours which had been sent to the Persian King's Lieutenant in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evil which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinity with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this Voyage; to which the Eretrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kindness that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which advantage they surprized Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or suspected; insomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-Roy in those parts, had no other hope of safety, than by retreating himself into the Castle, which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Persians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market-place strengthened by the River Pactolus, which ran thorow it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves made all the haste they could toward the Sea-side. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, and found them near Ephesus, where setting resolvedly upon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Army, the rest saving themselves in Ephesus. In this fight, Evalcides, Captain of the Eritreans perished: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent unto Aristagoras, and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perswaded to make any second tryal of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These news coming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded them courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes, against Athens: To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave only some form and assistance; the business when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded though he had perished, e're it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrences in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrel of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Islandes moreover did help to furnish out a Navy of three hundred and sixty sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to do him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their Discipline wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victory of any use to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open War and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Towns upon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities, when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himself in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territory belike he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troops in pieces.

About the same time Histiæus, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters, who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flee from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this Evasion preserved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the burial which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavy taking of his death.

Hiſtiæus had ſought to put himſelf into Miletus; but the Citizens, doubting his conditions, choſe rather to keep him out, and make ſhift for themſelves, without his help. The ſtrength of their City by Land, which had in old time withſtood the Lydian Kings and their good Fleet, which promiſed unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldned them to try the uttermoſt, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forſaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the cauſeleſs flight of thoſe that ſhould have aſſiſted them. Neither was it long before the Town it ſelf, being aſſaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens ſlain, their wives and children made ſlaves, and their goods a booty to the Perſians, whom for ſix years ſpace they had put to ſo much trouble.

§ VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece with the battel of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis War with good ſucceſs finiſhed by the Perſians, and ſome attempts made on Europe ſide with variable ſucceſs; Darius obſtinate in the enterpriſe and Conqueſt of Greece (though at firſt he pretended to make the War but againſt the Athenians and Eritræans, who joyntly aſſiſted the Ionians againſt him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambaſſadours, demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, ſome of them not ſo well reſolved as the reſt, ſubmitted themſelves; as the Æginets, and others. Againſt theſe, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the aſſiſtance of the Lacedemonians) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquiſh the party of the Perſians. Cleomenes led the Lacedemonians in this War, and cauſed his companion King Demaratus to be depoſed: who thereupon fled to Darius, far the more confident of victory, by reaſon of theſe diſcords, alienations and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagorus to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to tranſport his Army over the Helleſpont: the ſame conſiſting of an hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe. The charge in chief of his Army, he committed to Datis, accompanied and aſſiſted by Hippias, the Son of Piſiſtratus, expelled out of Athens twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his Brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coaſt of Aſia the leſs. Theſe Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-ſide, imbarqued themſelves in ſix hundred Gallies and other Veſſels; and firſt of all attempted the Iſlands, called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Aſia the leſs, and Greece. For (obtaining thoſe places) the Perſians had nothing to hinder the tranſportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might always both relieve themſelves in the paſſage, and ſhroud themſelves from all ſudden tempeſts and out-rage.

To this end, they firſt poſſeſt themſelves of Samos; ſecondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Iſland, the Inhabitants deſpairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was Native: Which Iſland Darius did not only forbear to ſack, but recalling the Inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered theſe and other Iſlands, the Perſians directed their courſe for Eretria in Eubœa for that City (as already hath been ſhewed) had aſſiſted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Iſland the Perſians took ground, and beſieged Eretria very ſtraitly, and after ſix days aſſault, partly by force, and in part by the treaſon of Euphabus and Philagius, they took it, ſackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of proſperous fortune filled their ſayls. From Eubœa the Perſians paſt their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians, finding the time arrived wherein they were to diſpute with their own vertues againſt Fortune, and to caſt lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themſelves in the beſt order they could to make reſiſtance, and withall ſent away with ſpeed to the Lacedemonians for ſuccour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who paſſing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Devil, which he ſuppoſed to be Pan, who willed him to aſſure the Athenians of victory, promiſing that ſome one of the gods ſhould be preſent at the battel, to aſſiſt them and defend them againſt the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return, ſeeing he could not bring with him any preſent ſuccours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promiſe of aſſiſtance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was ſomewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more ſtirred up with fond Prophecies and other like ſuperſtitious fooleries, than by any juſt cauſe or ſolid reaſon.

The Athenians being now left to themſelves, with one thouſand only of the Plateans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians againſt the Thebans, did in this extremity witneſs their thankfulneſs and grateful diſpoſition) began to diſpute, Whether it were moſt for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themſelves into the field with ſuch forces as they had, the ſame conſiſting of ten thouſand Athenians, and one thouſand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diverſity of opinions, Miltiades, who perſwaded the trial by battel, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians diſpoſed themſelves into three troops: two wings or horns, as they term them; and the body of a battel. The Perſians when they perceived ſo ſmall a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather diſpoſſeſt of their underſtandings, than poſſeſt with the reſolution whereof they made ſhew. So invincible and reſiſtleſs, the Perſians eſteemed their own numbers to be, and that ſmall troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be deſpiſed than to be fought withall: But in concluſion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, ſometime the vertue of the Grecians, and ſometimes the number of the Perſians prevailed; the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Perſians for that they needed not, theſe great forces of Darius were diſordered and put to rout; the Athenians following their Victory even to the Sea-ſhore; where the Perſians, ſo many of them as loſt not their wits with their courage, ſaved themſelves in their Ships.

The Perſian Army conſiſted of an hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe; of which there were ſlain in the place ſix thouſand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourſcore and twelve. For howſoever it came to paſs, either by ſtrange viſions, which were afterward called Pannici terrores, or by ſome other affright, it ſeemeth that the invading Army, after the firſt encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and loſt that number, by Herodotus

Herod. l. 6. Whether this City or People were of Peloponneſus in Sicyonia, or of Ægæ between Theſſalia and Macedon, I do not know; but thoſe borderers, and next the enemy, were more likely to compound than the reſt far off. dotus set down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Justin's report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slain, saith Justin and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos. Ad Art.

The greatest honour of this Victory was cast upon Miltiades, who both perswaded the trial by battel, and behaved himself therein answerably to the counsel which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark and commandment, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus against his fellow Romans: Alexander the Son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilides, after Halycarnasseus. In vita Aryst.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an employment against the Islanders at Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after six and twenty days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athens: where those ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battel of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles, (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his Estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envy of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankful and witless people, brought them, not many years after, from a Victorious and Famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hegesipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferiour to his Father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in Justice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for his loss he received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The dissention also among his Sons, of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by so great a Mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder Brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, Death, who hath no respect of any man's affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his Ancestors, about a year after the battel of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Artabasanes, born before he obtained the Kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes Governour of Egypt, Massites and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.
Of Xerxes.

§ 1.
The preparations of Xerxes against Greece,

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his Grand-father, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozostres, perswaded by many arguments the European War. But Artabanus, Brother to the late Darius, and Unkle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late Invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsel: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbark himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound couse for conductor, though the success do not always answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of her own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the King's hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this War (changing opinion and counsel) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this Invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand Horsemen, besides Charriots, Camels, and other Beasts of carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand foot-men. Hr. l. 7.

The Commanders of the several Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the King's house, or otherwise; for to these were all commandments of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a sister of Darius,

to

to whom were joyned ſome others of Xerxes his neareſt kindred, as Generals over all; ſaving that the charge of ten thouſand ſelect Perſians, called the Immortal Regiment (becauſe if any one of the whole number died, or were ſlain, there was another preſently choſen in his ſtead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thouſand Horſemen were led by the ſons of Datis, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight furniſhed by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriots, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Helleſpontines; who were truſted with the furniſhing of their own Veſſels, though commanded by the Princes of Perſia, as by Artabignes, the Son of Darius, and others. The reſt of the Veſſels for tranſportation were three thouſand. There were alſo certain Gallies furniſhed by Artemeſia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princeſs of Halicarnaſſens, and the Iſlands adjoyning, which her ſelf commanded. Thoſe Gallies by her prepared and furniſhed, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting of Zidon, in which Xerxes himſelf was imbarked.

§ II.

Xerxes's Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his Bridge of Boats over the Helleſpont: and the diſcourſe between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Army.

WHen this World of an Army was throughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvouz, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had aſſembled to the number of ſeventeen hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the Border of Celenus, he was by one Pythius a Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The feaſt ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting ſeven thouſand of the Perſian Darici; which make ſo many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuſe his treaſure offered, but commanded that ſeven thouſand Darici ſhould be given him to make up his four Milions; of which, ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the Preſent. But ſoon after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his five ſons from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelf was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his own ſon) Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his Father ſought exemption, to be ſundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carcaſe ſhould be laid on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-ſide. The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the ſame (with the half Iſland or Head-land, whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland, ſundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, beſides the Mountain and the Cherſoneſus, or Neck of Land it ſelf: a work of more oſtentation, than of uſe, and yet an enterpriſe of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs, (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to paſs in front. The Cities ſo ſevered from the main, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus and Gleonæ.

He alſo gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats ſhould be made over the Helleſpont between Abidus and Seſtos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which, after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torn aſunder and diſſevered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to be ſlain that were Maſters of the work, and cauſed ſix hundred threeſcore and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and induſtry of the Phenicians, was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boorded and railed, the whole Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand Foot, and fourſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt over it into Europe in ſeven days and ſeven nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Ceſar afterward uſe. And Caligula, that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridges, did build the like.

The Bridge finiſhed, and the Army brought near to the Sea-ſide, Xerxes took a view of all the Troops, aſſembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and ſeated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his own happineſs, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerful an Army and Fleet, he ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) burſt out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there ſhould not any one ſurvive of that marvellous multitude: The cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he uttered to Artabanus his Unkle, Artabanus ſpake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diſſolution of this great Troop within that number of years by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelf which we enjoy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in thoſe few days given us in the world: there is no man among theſe, or elſewhere, that ever found himſelf ſo accompanied with happineſs, but that he oftentimes pleaſed himſelf better with the deſire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diſeaſes and ſorrows whereto mankind is ſubject, being ſo many and inevitable, that the ſhorteſt life doth oftentimes appear unto us over long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reſt, but in deſired death alone.

With this melancholy diſcourſe, Xerxes being not much pleaſed, prayed Artabanus not to overcaſt thoſe joys which they had now in purſuit with ſad remembrances. And holding ſtill a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the Invaſion of Greece, againſt which he had formerly given many ſtrong reaſons, deſired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his firſt reſolution, that the enterpriſe of Greece could not be proſperous; or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Viſion, he was confident of good ſucceſs? Artabanus, notwithſtanding that he aſſured himſelf of the King's reſolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpoſe it ſelf, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellouſly affrighted him, and which the King ſhould find, as he feared, to be moſt adverſe; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, becauſe it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of ſo great a Fleet; inſomuch, as if any tempeſt ſhould ariſe, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any ſafety: and therefore when any ſuch ſhelter ſhall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to underſtand, that in ſuch a caſe of extremity, men are left to the will and diſpoſition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and diſpoſition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Army, and the Famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, disinable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacy had not misprised them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, not succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his Fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsel of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point; It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it less than two millions of Souls, besides his Beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few days suffer famine, and using Machiavel's words, Mourire sans consteo; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Country, to yield food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the sharpned points of their Weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylæ, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Landresses, Harlots and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprise any greater matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings had done, they had never grown to that greatness, or possest so many Kingdoms and Nations, as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great peril. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had inforc'd him to that War. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerful prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece were separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was answerable to the plantation, and the success and end agreeable to the weak counsel whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in, marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impedimenta potius sunt, quàm auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to Marshal such a world of men in one Army, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the Builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their Territory, brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a Sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius who perswaded the enterprise, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

§ III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near Pissyrus by his Cattel, with other accidents in his Marches towards Greece) I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of half an Acre of ground, lying between the Mountains, which did divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with Gates which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first days fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second days attempt upon the Greeks had proved in vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and so might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a secreet way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of Mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persians Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes, having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befal him by the vertue of such as had not been present at these battels, with whom he knew that he

he ſhortly was to deal. Eſpecially of the Spartans he ſtood in great fear, whoſe manhood appeared ſingular in this trial, which cauſed him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the Field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by ſaying, That the flight of the Perſian Arrows was ſo thick as would hide the Sun, he anſwered thus; It is very good news, for then ſhall we fight in the cool ſhade.

Such notable reſolution having as freely been expreſſed in deeds, as was uttered in words, cauſed the Perſian to ſtand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thouſand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferiour to thoſe, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counſel of Demaratus, a baniſhed King of the Spartans, who had always well adviſed and inſtructed him in the things of Greece, what courſe were fitteſt to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all Land-forces ſhould aſſemble together to defend Iſthmus, that ſtreight neck of ground which joyneth Peloponneſus to the Continent. For which cauſe he adviſed, That three hundred Ships well manned, ſhould be ſent unto the Coaſts of Laconia, to ſpoil the Country, and to hold the Lacedemonians and their Neighbours buſied at home, whilſt Xerxes at his leiſure having ſubdued the reſt, might afterwards bring his whole power upon them, who remaining deſtitute of ſuccour, would be too weak alone to make reſiſtance. To this purpoſe alſo the ſame Demaratus further adviſed, That the ſaid Fleet of three hundred Ships ſhould ſeize upon the Iſland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coaſt of Laconia, might ſerve as a fit place of Rendezvouz upon all occaſions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient Speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian ſhould be verified, that it were better for his Country-men to have that Iſle drowned in the Sea, than ſtand ſo inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counſel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not eaſie to gueſs. But a contrary opinion of Achemenes, Brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the ſafer. For the Perſian Fleet had been ſorely vexed with a grievous tempeſt, which continued three whole days together, wherein were loſt upon the Coaſt of Magneſia, four hundred Ships of War, beſides other veſſels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreſeen, that if any ſuch calamity ſhould over-take them, there would not be found any Harbour wide enough to give them ſuccour. Therefore Achemenes perſwaded his Brother not to diſperſe his Fleet; for if (he ſaid) after the loſs of four hundred Ships we ſhall ſend away other three hundred to ſeek all adventures, then will the Greeks be ſtrong enough by Sea to encounter the reſt of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counſel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land Army and Fleet, ſhould each of them ſtand the other in good ſtead, whilſt both held one courſe, and lay not far aſunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the ſame time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewiſe made a ſorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecians Fleet lay at that time at Artemiſium, in the ſtraits of Eubœa, where the Perſians thinking to encompaſs them, ſent two hundred ſail about the Iſland to fall upon them behind, uſing a like ſtratagem to that which their King did practiſe againſt Leonidas, in a caſe not unlike, but with far different ſucceſs. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Eubœa from the Main, was in the ſame ſort held by a Navy of two hundred threeſcore and eleven ſail againſt the huge Perſian Armado, as the ſtraits of Thermopyle had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of thoſe two hundred Ships that were ſent about the Iſland, and the cauſe of their voyage, was two well known in the Perſian Fleet, and ſoon enough diſcloſed to the Greeks, who ſetting ſail by night, met them with a counter-ſurpriſe, taking and ſinking thirty Veſſels, inforcing the reſt to take the Sea; where, being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and caſt all away. Contrariwiſe, the Navy of the Greeks were increaſed by the arrival of fifty three Athenian Ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the laſt fight. As theſe new forces encouraged the one ſide, ſo the fear of Xerxes his diſpleaſure ſtirred up the other to redeem their loſs with ſome notable exploit. Wherefore ſetting aſide their unfortunate policy, they reſolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and caſting themſelves into the form of a Creſcent, thought ſo to incloſe the Greeks, who readily did preſent them battel at Artemiſium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equal loſs to both parts. For, though more of the Perſians Ships were ſunk and taken, yet the leſſer loſs fell altogether as heavy upon the Greekiſh Fleet, which being ſmall, could worſe bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may ſeem to have had the worſe, that they forſook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and ſpoils to the enemy, who nevertheleſs were fain to abandon preſently even the paſſage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ſhips were ſorely cruſht in the battel, and eſpecially becauſe they had received advertiſement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopyle. Before they weighed Anchors, Themiſtocles, General of the Athenians, engraved upon ſtone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they ſhould revolt unto the Greeks or ſtand neutral; which perſwaſion, he hoped, would either take ſome place with them, or at the leaſt make them ſuſpected by the Perſians.

§ IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHen Xerxes had paſt the ſtraits of Thermopylæ, he waſted the Country of the Phocians, and the Regions adjoyning: as for the Inhabitants, they choſe rather to fly, and reſerve themſelves to a day of battle, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of ſaving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their ſervice. Part of his Army he ſent to ſpoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great Perſonages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the Goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great aſtoniſhment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have ſacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnaſſus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure ſomewhat ſuperſtitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, ſaith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And ſurely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for ſeeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he ſhould not have dared to entertain a covetous deſire of enriching himſelf by committing ſacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may poſſibly be true, that licenſe to chaſtiſe his impiety, in ſuch manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy one, who ſaith, Will a man ſpoil his Gods? and elſewhere; Hath any Nation changed their Gods, which yet are no Gods? Go to the Iſles of Kittim, and behold, and ſend to Kedar and take diligent heed, and ſee whether there be any ſuch things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcuſable, for that the Perſians alledged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they ſet fire on the City of Sardis in Aſia, to be the ground and cauſe of the waſt which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize againſt Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, diſcovered the face of covetouſneſs ſo much the more ugly, by how much the more themſelves had profeſſed a deteſtation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer miſchance.

was

Judæ. 3. 2. Jerem. 2. 9. & 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expreſſed briefly thus. He came to Athens, which finding forſaken, he took and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by ſome of more courage than wiſdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens ſhould be ſafe in woodden Walls, had fortified that place with boards and Paliſſadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their deſperate valour ſo well maintained at the firſt aſſault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the propheſie: whereof (being ſomewhat obſcure) it was wiſely done of Themiſtocles, to make diſcretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the preſent need, than faſhioning the buſineſs to words.

§. V.

How Themiſtocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trœzene, Ægina, and Salamis, not ſo highly prizing their houſes and lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheleſs this great zeal, which the Athenians did ſhew for the general good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to ſtay for them at Salamis, whilſt they removed their wives and children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was preſently reſolved upon, that they ſhould forſake the Iſle of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Iſthmus: which neck of land they did purpoſe to fortifie againſt the Perſians, and ſo to defend Peloponneſus by Land and Sea, leaving the reſt of Greece as indefenſible to the fury of the Enemie. So ſhould the Iſlands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there beſtowed as in places of ſecurity) have been given over into mercileſs bondage. Againſt this reſolution, Themiſtocles, Admiral of the Athenian Fleet, very ſtrongly made oppoſition, but in vain. For the Peloponneſians were ſo poſſeſſed with fear of loſing their own, which they would not hazard, that no perſwaſions could obtain of them, to regard the eſtate of their diſtreſſed friends, and Allies. Many remonſtrances Themiſtocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the Enemy at Salamis; As firſt in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the ſelf ſame fear which made them forſake thoſe coaſts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the firſt) cauſe them alſo to diſſever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himſelf to the defence of his own City and Eſtate: Then to the Council of War which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of Courage might work in them hereafter) he ſhewed that the Fight at Iſthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer Ships, to determine the matter in the the ſtraights; and that, beſides the ſafeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they ſhould by abiding, where they then were, ſufficiently defend Iſthmus, which the Barbarians ſhould not ſo much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea: which they could not ſo well hope for elſewhere, as in that preſent place which gave them ſo good advantage. All this would not ſerve to retain the Peloponneſians, of whom one, unworthy of memory, upbraided Themiſtocles with the loſs of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for ſuffering one to ſpeak in the Council, that had no Countrey of his own to inhabit. A baſe and ſhameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loſs, which being voluntarily ſuſtained for the common good, was in true eſtimation by ſo much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exaſperate Themiſtocles, and put into his mouth a reply ſo ſharp, as availed more than all his former perſwaſions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City, than any Nation of Greece could boaſt of; having well-near two hundred good ſhips of War, the better part of the Græcian Fleet, with which it was eaſie for them to tranſport their Families and ſubſtance into any part of the World, and ſettle themſelves in a more ſecure Habitation, leaving thoſe to ſhift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refuſed to ſtand by them. Herewithal he mentioned a Town in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Town he ſaid an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proceſs of time ſhould build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our ſelves, leaving unto you a ſorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulneſs. The Peloponneſians hearing thus much began to enter into better conſideration of the Athenians, whoſe affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon ſo weak terms, that they ſhould be driven to crouch to others; but rather were ſuch, as might inforce the reſt to yield to them, and condeſcend even to the uttermoſt of their own demands.

For the Athenians, when they firſt embraced that Heroical reſolution of leaving their Grounds and Houſes to Fire and Ruine, if neceſſity ſhould inforce them ſo far, for the preſervation of their Liberty; did imploy the moſt of their private Wealth, and all the common Treaſure, in building a great Navy. By theſe means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no ſuch calamity ſhould befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoiſed by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a ſtrong Fleet would either procure Victory at Home, or a ſecure paſſage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it ſufficient, if building a few new ſhips they did ſomewhat amend their Navy. Whereby it came to paſs, that, had they been vanquiſhed, they could not have expected any other fortune than either preſent death, or perpetual ſlavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, whoſe forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole conſiſting of no more than three hundred and fourſcore bottoms. Wherefore theſe Peloponneſians beginning to ſuſpect their own condition, which would have ſtood upon deſperate points, if the Fleet of Athens had forſaken them; were ſoon perſwaded, by the greater fear of ſuch a bad event, to forget the leſſer, which they had conceived of the Perſians: and laying aſide their inſolent Bravery, they yielded to that moſt profitable Counſel of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Perſians conſulted about giving battel: and how Themiſtocles by policy held the Greeks to their reſolution; with the Victory at Salamis thereupon enſuing.

IN the mean ſeaſon the Perſians had entred into conſultation, whether it were convenient to offer Battel to the Greeks, or no. The reſt of the Captains giving ſuch advice as they thought would beſt pleaſe the King their Maſter, had ſoon agreed upon the Fight: but Artemiſia Queen of Halicarnaſſus, who followed Xerxes to this War in perſon, was of a contrary Opinion. Her Counſel was, that the King himſelf directly ſhould march toward Peloponneſus, whereby it would come to paſs that the Greek Navy, (unable otherwiſe to continue long at Salamis for want of Proviſion) ſhould preſently be diſſevered, and every one ſeeking to preſerve his own City and Goods, they ſhould, being divided, prove unable to reſiſt him, who had won ſo far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give Battel, ſo on the other ſide the danger will be more (ſaid ſhe) which we ſhall undergo, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the Loſs, in caſe it fall upon us, greater than the Profit of the Victory which we deſire. For if we compel the Enemies to fly, it is no more than they would have done, we ſitting ſtill; but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put us to the worſt, the Journey to Peloponneſus is utterly daſht, and many that now declare for us, will ſoon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had ſent for that purpoſe to the Fleet, related unto his Maſter the common Conſent of the other Captains, and withal, this diſagreeing Opinion of Artemiſia. The King well pleaſed with her Advice, yet reſolved upon following the more general, but far worſe Counſel of the reſt; which would queſtionleſs have been the ſame which Artemiſia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that as out of their own Judgment, which they thought moſt comfortable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain perſwaſion of much good, that his own Preſence upon the Shore to behold the Conflict, would work among the Soldiers. Therefore he incamped upon the Sea-ſide, pitching his own Tent upon the Mount Ægalens, which is oppoſite unto the Iſle of Salamis, whence at eaſe he might ſafely view all which might happen in that Action, having Scribes about him to write down the Acts and Behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the News of that timorous Diligence, which their Countrimen ſhewed in fortifying the Iſthmus, and of a Perſian Army marching apace thither, did now again ſo terrifie and amaze the Peloponneſians, that no intreaty nor conteſtation would ſuffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madneſs to fight for a Country already loſt, when they rather ſhould endeavour to ſave that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themſelves what miſery would befall them, if loſing the Victory, they ſhould be driven into Salamis, there to be ſhut up, and beſieged round in a poor deſolate Iſland.

Hereupon they reſolved forthwith to ſet ſail for Iſthmus: which had preſently been done, if the Wiſdom of Themiſtocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent Fear had ſtopt up their ears againſt all good Counſel, did practiſe another courſe, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwholſome Decree; not ſuffering the very hour of performance to find him buſie in wrangling altercation. As ſoon as the Council brake up, he diſpatched ſecretly a truſty Gentleman to the Perſian Captains, informing them truly of the intended Flight, and exhorting them to ſend part of their Navy about the Iſland, which incompaſſing the Greeks might prevent their eſcape; giving them withal a falſe hope of his aſſiſtance. The Perſians no ſooner heard than believed theſe good news, well knowing that the Victory was their own aſſured, if the Athenian Fleet joyned with them, which they might eaſily hope, conſidering what ability their Maſter had to recompence for ſo doing, both the Captains with rich Rewards, and the People with reſtitution of their City and Territories. By theſe means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the Morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themſelves incloſed round with Perſians, who had laboured hard all night, ſending many of their Ships about the Iſle of Salamis, to charge the Enemy in Rear, and landing many of their men in the Iſle of Pſyttalea, which lieth over againſt Salamis, to ſave ſuch of their own, and kill ſuch of the Græcian Party, as by any misfortune ſhould be caſt upon the Shore. Thus did meer neceſſity enforce the Græcians to undertake the Battel in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, ſtemming the foremoſt of the Enemies, and chaſing the reſt, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great Battel to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearieſome task of writing down many Diſaſters that befel the Perſian Fleet, which ill acquitted it ſelf that day, doing no one peece of Service worthy the Preſence of their King, or the regiſtring of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well ſeem to have wrought out that Victory with equal Courage, were it not that the principal Honour of that day was aſcribed to thoſe of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land-Army of Xerxes lay, the Ships of Ægina having poſſeſſed the Straights, did ſink or take them, whilſt the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon thoſe that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of reſiſting.

Of things following after the Battel of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

After this Victory, the Greeks intending, by way of ſcrutiny, to determine which of the Captains had beſt merited of them, in all this great Service; every Captain, being ambitious of that Honour, did in the firſt place write down his own name, but in the ſecond place, as beſt deſerving next unto himſelf, almoſt every Suffrage did concur upon Themiſtocles. Thus private affection yielded unto vertue, as ſoon as her own turn was ſerved. The Perſian King, as not amazed with this Calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in ſuch faſhion, that they which were beſt acquainted with his temper, might eaſily diſcern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Eſpecially Mardonius, Author of the War, began to caſt a wary Eye upon his Maſter, fearing leſt his Counſel ſhould be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purpoſing rather to adventure his life in purſuit of the Victory, than to caſt it away by undergoing his Princes indignation; he adviſed the King to leave unto him three hundred thouſand men, with which Forces he promiſed to reduce all Greece under the ſubjection of the Perſian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to ſooth Xerxes with many fair words; telling him, that the cowardiſe of thoſe Ægyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metal, nothing better than Slaves, who had ſo ill behaved themſelves in the late Sea-ſervice, did not concern his Honour, who had always been Victorious, and had already ſubdued the better part of Greece, yea, taken Athens it ſelf, againſt which the War was principally intended. Theſe words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who preſently betook himſelf to his Journey homewards, making the more haſt, for that he underſtood, how the Greeks had a purpoſe to ſail to Helleſpont, and there to break down his Bridge, and intercept his paſſage. True it was that the Greeks had no ſuch intent, but rather wiſhed his haſty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not ſo ſtrong, as it ſhould have been, had he in perſon remained with it. And for this cauſe did Eurybiades give Counſel that by no means they ſhould attempt the breaking of that Bridge, leſt Neceſſity ſhould inforce the Perſians to take Courage, and rather to fight like Men, than die like Beaſts. Wherefore Themiſtocles did, under pretence of Friendſhip, ſend a falſe Advertiſement to this timorous Prince, adviſing him to convey himſelf into Aſia with all ſpeed, before his Bridge were diſſolved: which Counſel Xerxes took very kindly, and haſtily followed, as before is ſhewed. Whether it were ſo that he found the Bridge whole, and thereby repaſſed into Aſia; or whether it were torn in ſunder by Tempeſts, and he thereby driven to Embark himſelf in ſome obſcure Veſſel, it is not greatly material; though the Greeks did moſt willingly embrace the latter of theſe reports. Howſoever it were, this flight of his did well eaſe the Countrey; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of People, which as Locuſts, had before over-whelmed it.

§. VIII.

The Negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as alſo between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thouſand had with-drawn himſelf into Theſſaly, whence he ſent Alexander, the Son of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embaſſador to the Athenians, with promiſe of large amends for all their loſſes received, and of extending their Territories as far as their own deſires; allowing them to retain their Liberty and Laws, if they would make Peace with Xerxes, and aſſiſt him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their Wives and Children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be ſecure, till the Army of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, underſtanding what fair Conditions this Embaſſador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, leſt he ſhould find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon they likewiſe very ſpeedily diſpatched their Embaſſadors for Athens, who arriving, before the Macedonian had Audience, uſed the beſt of their perſwaſion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War againſt the reſt of Greece, but had only threatned the ſubverſion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates Arming themſelves in defence of that City, were drawn into the Quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injuſtice could not leave them. We know, ſay they, that ye have endured great Calamities, loſing the Fruit of the Grounds, and being driven to forſake the Town, the Houſes whereof be ruined, and unfit for your Habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your Wives and Children amongſt us, as long as the War ſhall continue, hoping that ye, who have always procured Liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into Slavery and Bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promiſes are large, but their words and oaths are of no aſſurance. It was needleſs to uſe many Arguments to the Athenians, who gave anſwer to Alexander in preſence of the Spartan Embaſſadors; That whileſt the Sun continued his courſe they would be Enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any Riches, with which he might ſeek to make purchaſe of their Liberty. Concerning the maintenance of their Wives and Children, it was a burden which they promiſed to ſuſtain themſelves, only deſiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all ſpeed they would cauſe their Army to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long ſit ſtill in Theſſaly, having once received ſuch a peremptory anſwer. In this their Opinion of Mardonius his readineſs to invade Attica, they found themſelves nothing deceived. For he, as ſoon as Alexander had returned their obſtinate purpoſe of reſiſtance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them, and their City: they having now the ſecond time quitted it, and conveyed themſelves into places of more ſecurity abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrival of their Confederates.

From Athens he ſent his Agent unto them with inſtructions, not only to perſwade them to acceptance of the Conditions before to them propounded, but with great promiſes to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was that either the People, wearied with forſaking their Houſes ſo often, would be deſirous to preſerve them from Fire, and to have thoſe which were already laid waſte, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would relie upon their old Confederates, whoſe ſuccours did very ſlowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be won with great Rewards, to draw them to his purpoſe; all which projects if they ſhould fail, the deſtruction of Athens would be a good mean to pleaſe his Maſter King Xerxes, who muſt thereby needs underſtand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the ſtrongeſt part of their own Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all theſe. For the Athenians ſo little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demoſthenes calls him) Cyrſilus, adviſed the Senate to accept the Conditions, and propound them to the People; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Council-houſe heard what he had ſaid, immediately ſet upon him, and ſtoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money, that had moved him to utter ſuch a vile ſentence. Yea, the Women of Athens in the Iſle of Salamis, hearing of his bad Counſel, and bad end, aſſembling together, did enter his Houſe there, and put his Wife and Children to the like Execution. All this bravery notwithſtanding, when they perceived the ſlackneſs of the Peloponneſians in giving them aid, they were fain to betake themſelves to Salamis again, the old place of their ſecurity. Remaining there, and ſeeing little forwardneſs in thoſe whom it moſt concerned to aſſiſt them, they ſent very ſevere Meſſages to Sparta, complaining of their ſlackneſs, and threatning withall, to take ſuch courſe as might ſtand beſt with their own good, ſeeing that the common eſtate of all was ſo little regarded. Theſe Meſſengers were at the firſt entertained with dilatory anſwers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponneſian Wall, builded athwart the Iſthmus, was almoſt finiſhed. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careleſs and dull, ſo the Athenians hotly preſſed them to a quick reſolution, giving them plainly to underſtand, that if they ſhould hold on in thoſe dilatory courſes, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new courſe, that ſhould little pleaſe them. All this while the Perſian Fleet lay upon the Coaſt of Aſia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewiſe the Greekiſh Navy contained it ſelf within the Harbours upon Europe ſide; both to do ſervice where need ſhould require at home; and withall to ſhun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that being diſtracted from the reſt had adventured over far. So mutual fear preſerved in quiet the Iſlands lying in the midſt of the Ægæan Seas. But it was well and ſeaſonably obſerved by a Counſellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Iſthmus would ſerve to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: conſidering that many doors would be opened into that Demi-Iſland, as ſoon as the Enemy ſhould by winning the Friendſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better peruſal of their own dangers, were very careful to give ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their delays, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it ſeemed, of renouncing their Alliance. Wherefore diſpatching away five thouſand Spartans in the Evening, under conduct of Pauſanias; they gave Audience the next day to the Embaſſadors, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſs; deeply ſwearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the Journey; and giving them leave to take up other five thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of gravity, in a matter ſo important, were nevertheleſs contented with the final concluſion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haſte they could to encamp in Atticæ. The other Grecians were nothing ſlack in ſending forth Companies, whoſe near approach cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Countrey, and therefore of much diſadvantage to Horſe, wherein conſiſted the beſt of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating down the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of War.

The great Battel of Platææ.

IT were too long a rehearſal to ſhew all that happened in many Skirmiſhes between the Greeks and him, in the Countrey of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to be the ſeat of that War. Much time was ſpent before the Quarrel was decided by tryal of one main Battel: for both parties did ſtand upon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſail them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoined the Forces of Thebes, Macedony, Theſſaly, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed his Camp with fifty thouſand men. Againſt theſe the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had levied an Army of one hundred and ten thouſand, of which forty thouſand were waightily Armed, the reſt were only Aſſiſtants to theſe forty thouſand, being Armed more ſlightly, as rather to make excurſions and give chaſe, than to ſuſtain any ſtrong charges.

Theſe two Armies having eleven days confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of Service; Mardonius, whoſe Victuals began to fail, reſolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promiſed Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the Plain of Ceres and Proſerpina, making Prayers unto certain Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle deſigned. For the Plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was alſo an old Temple of Ceres and Proſerpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewiſe the memorials of thoſe Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the ſame place, upon Mount Cithæron, and the ground ſerved well for foot-men againſt Horſe; only the Land belonged unto the Platæans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whileſt the Greeks were perplexed about the Interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Platæans, to make all clear, did freely beſtow their Land on that ſide the Town upon the Athenians.

This Magnificence of the Platæans cauſed Alexander the Great, many Ages after, to re-edifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponneſian Wars.

All things being ready for Battel; the Lacedæmonian General thought it moſt meet, that the Athenians ſhould ſtand oppoſite that day to the Medes and Perſians, whom they had formerly vanquiſhed vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose Valour the Medes and Persians had felt heavy proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers of Greece) he did also change the order of his Battel, and oppose himself to Pausanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on Horse-back, who did so molest the Greeks at their Watering-place, that they were fain to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much loss to themselves, and none to the Enemy, lie near to that Fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the Morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer Cowardise) he charged them in the Rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient Valour, That the Lacedæmonians being over-taken by the Enemies Horse, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for Victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of special mark lost, before any sign of good success appeared in the entrails.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the Superstition of that Age and Countrey accounted fortunate; he gave the Signal of Battel: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great Battel, because the Thebans, and other Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans, with other their Assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the Field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such Courage as desperate Necessity enforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of Assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the mean season the Athenians, having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtain Victory; which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians, whom they found wearily busied in Assaulting the Camp, with more Valour than Skill. Wherefore they themselves undertook it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entred, with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especial cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of several Nations and Languages, and having lost their General with other principal Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemies Countrey, against an Army of men far more Valiant than themselves, and inflamed with present Victory. Therefore the same Wall which for a few hours had preserved their lives, by holding out the Enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitiful Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the People of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, That he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of Service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would have been Hostile unto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large Marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behind and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and great Conquest; though forting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seen, and rather worse, for as much as it began the Quarrel, which never ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greeks despised and sought to have been brought into Slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the Vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weakness of their Enemies.

The Battel of Mycale, with a strange Accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and Examples of the like.

THE same day on which the Battel was fought at Platæa, there was another Battel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian Fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Islanders and Ionians, did sail into those parts, to deliver the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threescore thousand under the Command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their Ships a ground, fortifying with Palissadoes and otherwise, as much ground as did seem needful for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrival, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the Shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek Tongue to remember Liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubœa; trusting that either these perswasions would prevail; or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealosie in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own Companions. It need not seem strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining Estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of Liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former Bravery, little regarded, and less feared any Treason, to be contrived by their Subjects, were now so wary, that from the Samians, which were amongst them, they took away their Arms; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the straight Passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the Fight, and laying hold upon such Weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said, that whilst the Greeks were yet in march towards the Enemies Camp, a Rumor suddenly ran in the Army that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Soldiers) was very true. For the Battle of Platæa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report, of that great Battel, wherein Paulus Æmilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four days, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the Battel by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the Battel against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the Victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperor. This Lucius Antonius being Lievtenant of the higher Germany, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperor; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War; it was suddainly reported that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the Gods, and shew all manner of publick joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tidings could not be found, the Emperor Domitian betook himself to his Journey against the Rebel; and being with his Army in March, he received advertisment by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the Rumour noised before in Rome, of the self same Victory, he found that the Report and Victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand Furlongs (which make about five and twenty hundred Miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many Rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in Dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to terrifie those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous Noises; as he raised the Siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a noise, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such a mean as this, to animate the Greeks; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great fear, least their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilst they went wandering to seek out Enemies afar off, upon the Coast of Asia. But the fame of the Battel fought at Platææ being noised among them; every man desired that his own Valour in the present Fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the Enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and straight Passages, to win the higher Ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Camp (ere the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palisadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the Place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this Fight the Samians did good Service, as is formerly mentioned. Isa. 37. 7.

But the Milesians, who upon the like jealousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the Passages; did now (as if they had been set on purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the Sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retired in whole Troops; making them fly dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the last Fight of that huge Army levied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive War.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous quality of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian Affairs, to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Battel; but little mind had he to revenge either this or other his great Losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom, when he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her Husband, he thought it best to make a Match between his own Son Darius and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity miliarity, as might work out his Desire. But whether it were so, that the Chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the Beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vitious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in Peace, as to guide his Army in War. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife; caused the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands Conversation with her, which she imputed not so much to the Beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the Cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extream hatred. Therefore at a Royal Feast, wherein the Custom was that the King should grant every Request, she craved that the Wife of Masistes, her Husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her Disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the Abuse of such a Custom, or have deluded the importunate Cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her self with the like, to whatsoever she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the Request, and sending for his Brother perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems, that he understood how villanously that poor Lady should be intreated, whom he knew to be vertuous, and whom himself had loved. Masistes refused to put her away; alledging his own Love, her deserving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Son, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked mannan Xerxes reviled him; saying, That he now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promised unto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when returning Home, he found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queen Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this Villany, took his way with his Children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebel and avenge himself. But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the Sword. Such was the tyrannical condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute Power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much Virtue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his overthrown, and lying upon the Ground, said, That he doubted, whether, in regard of his Virtue, he should again erect it, or, for the Mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a Coward, and consequently merciless.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the Virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the Wickedness and Vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a Virtue almost equal to that which did establish it. In Wars against the Ægyptians, the Fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been very good; but against the general Estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his Posterity, did ever make offensive War, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale served but as an Introduction; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Soldier at his own doors, than in a forraign Country: whereof good trial was made forthwith, and much better proof as soon as the Affairs of Athens were quietly setled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the Estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian Estate continued in her Greatness many Ages following, in such wise, that the known parts of the World had no other Kingdom representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatness depended only upon the Riches and Power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, wherewith both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unweildy, and (as it were) fatned for the hungry Swords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to pass, that Xerxes and his Successors were fain to defend their Crowns with money and base Policies; very seldom or never (unless it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the trial of plain Battel with that little Nation of Greece, which would soon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private Malice and Jealousie urged every City to envy the height of her Neighbours Walls, and thereby diverted the Swords of the Greeks into their own Bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued to hew out the way of Conquest on the side of Asia.

Chap. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian War to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Persians had received their last Blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Græcian Army, leaving the pursuit of the War to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and other places, out of which they had been levied. The Athenians in the mean while besieged Sestos, a City on the Straight of the Hellespont, between which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their Wives and Children, since the Invasion of Attica, and the abandonning of Athens, in divers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their Houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the Walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their Wives and Children, with any private Buildings: Whereof the Lacedæmonians being advertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwalled, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerful by Sea, than either themselves or any other State of Greece, they dispatched Messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any private misslike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their Enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to go on with their Works by the advice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their Walls to that height, as they cared not for their misslikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his Fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealousie (for by the arrival of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the Walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to believe Reports and vain Rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose Relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which requeſt being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few days, and in conclusion to hold them among them till himself and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their Liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his Associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true, that the Walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to believe, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well understood what appertained to a Common-weal and their own Safety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the woodden Walls of their Ships, from the resolution of their own Counsels and Courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous War against the Persians, they found their own Judgments, and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or less fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-wealth among the Greeks; and therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their own Affairs, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confederated within Greece should be left open, or else that the Wall of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, dissembled their misslike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the Division, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might under covert imbark themselves upon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous Wars made by that State upon the Persian.

The Athenians having setled things in good order at Home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Persians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cypres, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where after their landing, having possest themselves of many principal places, they imbarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City Byzantium, now Constantinople:

ſtantinople: from whence, Pauſanias behaving himſelf more like a Tyrant than a Captain, eſpecially towards the Ionians, lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accuſed of many inſolent Behaviors, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treaſon againſt his Country. In his ſtead they imployed Dorcis, who either gave the ſame cauſe of offence, or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt Commandment in that War, practiſed the Souldiers to complain; though indeed the wiſe and vertuous Behaviour of Ariſtides, General of the Athenian Forces, a man of rare and incomparable ſincerity, had been able to make a good Commander ſeem ill in compariſon of himſelf; and therefore was much more available in rendring thoſe deteſted, whoſe Vices afforded little matter of excuſe. Howſoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no leſs weary of the War, than the Athenians were eager to purſue it, the one obtained their Eaſe, and the other the Execution and Honor, which they deſired: for all the Greeks (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubjected themſelves to the Commandment of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their Greatneſs in that preſent Age, and of their Ruine in the next ſucceeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receivers and Treaſurers, and began to levy Money according to their Diſcretion, for the Maintenance of the general Defence of Greece, and for the recovering of thoſe places on Europe ſide, in Aſia the leſs, and the Iſlands, from the Perſians. This Tribute (the firſt that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threeſcore Talents, which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that juſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the Confederates referred themſelves, and no one man found occaſion to complain of him. But as the Vertue of Ariſtides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great Commodity; ſo the deſire which they conceived of encreaſing their Commodity, corrupted their Vertue, and robbing them of the general Love which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her Treaſure, which with her in the next Age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe four hundred and threeſcore Talents were raiſed to ſix hundred, nor long after that, ere their covetous Tyranny had converted their Followers into Slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at the firſt appointed for the Treaſure-houſe wherein theſe Sums were laid up; and where, at the general Aſſembly, the Captains of thoſe Forces, ſent by the Confederates, were for Form ſake called to Conſultation. But the Athenians, who were ſtronger by Sea than all Greece beſides, had lockt up the common Treaſure in an Iſland under their own Protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War, was Cimon the Son of Miltiades, who firſt took Eiona, upon the River Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they maſtered the Cariſtij, and brought into ſervitude the Naxij, contrary to the form of the Confederacy: So did they other the Inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their Contribution, or diſobeyed their Commandments; taking upon them and uſurping a kind of ſovereign Authority over the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own Perſons, and given up altogether to their eaſe, made choice rather to pay their parts in Money, than either in Men of War, or in Ships; leaving the proviſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Wars; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Navy and their Experiences, being always armed and employed in Honourable Services, at the coſt of thoſe, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their foot-men. Yet was the Tribute-money, levied upon theſe their Confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well Manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral ſcouring the Aſiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaſelis; which having formerly pretended Neutrality, and refuſed to relieve, or any way aſſiſt the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a Fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he ſet Sail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet rode, being of ſix hundred Sail, or (according to the moſt ſparing report) three hundred and fifty; and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the ſhoar: All which Forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred Ships taken by the Athenians, the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunk, ere ever they had ſwam in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoon preſented with a third. For fourſcore Sail of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, under the Perſian Command) thinking to have joyned themſelves with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arrived upon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſs than what enſued. Upon the firſt notice of their approach Cimon weighed Anchor, and meeting them at an Head-Land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they only ſought to run themſelves on ground; by which means preſerving few of their Men, they loſt all their Ships. Theſe loſſes did ſo break the Courage of the Perſian, that, omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condeſcended to whatſoever Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Aſia; and further Covenanting, That none of his Ships of War ſhould ſail to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidoniæ.

This was the moſt Honourable Peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as, under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Perſia; in which War few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great Command, but ſerved altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The Death of Xerxes by the Treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gave juſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking Peace upon any terms not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving that the King his Maſter did easily take small occasions to shed the Bloud of such, as in Kindred or Place were near unto him, began to repose less hope of safety in remaining faithful, than of obtaining the Sovereignty, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his Cruelty, and despised for his Cowardice and Misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the Son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer Death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great Wickedness he got the Kingdom, and held it seven Months; or whether intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the Son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprized, it were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole Family put to Death by extream Torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse.

Raro antecedentem scelestum
Deseruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldom the Villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

§. IV.

The Banishment of Themistocles: His flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his Death.

ARtaxerxes being established in his Kingdom, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than he or his Predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the People of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merits in that service, that they not only thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but, even within their own Walls, they would admit none other form of Government than meerly Democratical. Herein they were so insolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preserve the Estate of any such as had born great Office, longer than, by flattering the rascal multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanor much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had laid the foundations of his greatness upon Popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracism, whereby he was Banished for ten years, as a man over-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new Accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Country of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driven, after many troublesom flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his Affairs by the Counsel and Assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitless. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Ægypt, causing it to rebel against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Ægypt, and scowring those Eastern Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that Peace, which to their great Honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelines of good success, in leading a great Army of dastardly Persians against the Warlike People of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to seek Honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great Forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well-deserving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deserving People, by finishing his life with a cup of Poison.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the Peace, which to their great Honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Ægypt.

THen was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Ægyptian War, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong Enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred Sail strong was sent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which Conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintain, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a Peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proof of the Grecian Valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any Ships of War (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one should be found sailing towards Greece, the Peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole Estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an Enemy too far over-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, left the League which in his own worser fortunes he had made with the[illegible]e would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their Revenues and Power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure Honour by Profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottom of the Straights between Cilicia, Syria, and Ægypt; is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by Trade with those Countries, or to infest one or more of them when they are his Enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sudden well-nigh choaked with a greater morsel, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed lowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Ægypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhausted by the late Wars, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garisons, conceived rightly, that if such small Forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his own Guards, or levy out of the ordinary Garisons, were by him defeated, the naturals of the Country, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soon break faith with him who had no other Title to that Kingdom than a good Sword. Further, he perswaded himself that the People, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawn to accept him, the Author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him: For having taken and cruelly slain Achæmenes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and Proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the War. But he considering his own weakness, and that the means of the Ægyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, far greater Forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the virtue of the Souldiers therein embarqued; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdom of Ægypt as a far greater Reward of their Adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their Estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equal share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the Peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affairs was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopeful success: For they entred the Land as far as to Memphis, the principal City; and of the City it self they took two parts: to the third part, which was called the White Wall, they laid such hard Siege, that neither those Forces of the Persians, which then were in Ægypt, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well devise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedæmonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to look home-wards to their own defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure Assistance of the Greeks one against the other, by stirring them up with Gold to the entertainment of private Quarrels, for the good of their common Enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in employing their whole Force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Ægypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief, who had now the space of six years defended his Masters right in Ægypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his Name, the Son of Zopyrus, who arriving in Ægypt, was first encountred by the revolted People; over whom he obtained a Victory, which made him Master of the Country, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great City. It cannot be doubted, but that long abode in a strange Air, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: Sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Country to Obedience, attempted the City it self, whether his former success had amended the Courage of the Persians, or want of Necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so near, as they were forc'd to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteen Months Siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenian without impediment of Waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the Sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same Entertainment had fifty other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Army was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell unawares among the Phœnician Gallies and the Persian Army; so as the Persians recovered all Ægypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians six years War in Ægypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many Enterprises at once.

Prosopites, an Island between the Rivers of Taly & Pharmuthiacus, two of the outlets of Nilus, towards Alexandria; Mendesius is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Busiriticus and Diolcos. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the City Panæphysis.

§. VI.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the most part with good success, about the same time.

NOtwithstanding these overthrows in Ægypt, yet the Athenians in their home-wars waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their Forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten near unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great Victories soon after; the one over the Peloponnesians, near unto Cecryphalia; the other over the Æginets, near unto Ægina; where they sunk and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they Landed their Forces on the sudden, and Besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great Fight, with equal loss, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trophy, as Victors in the former Battel, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garisons, and Megarians, to their great loss and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited near to Tanagra by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which time the Thessalian Horse-men turned from their Allies, the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore days after, the Athenians entred Bœotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the Gulf Oeteus, and evened the Walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base Conditions; as to beat down the Walls of their City, and to give them Hostages for Tribute; the Siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these Victories, they sack'd and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of thoſe ſix years that a part of their Forces made War in Ægypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theſſaly, perſwaded thereunto by Oreſtes, but were reſiſted by the King Pharſalus, who had chaſed Oreſtes out of his Dominions. They alſo Landed in Sicyonia, and had Victory over thoſe that reſiſted; after which, they made Truce with the Peloponneſians for five years, and ſent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred Ships, but they were again allured by Amyrteus, one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Mariſh and Woody parts of Ægypt from the Perſians, to whom they ſent ſixty of their Ships. The reſt of their Army failing in their enterpriſe of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coaſted the Iſland, encountred a Fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned Victorious into Greece; as alſo thoſe returned ſafe which were ſent into Ægypt.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahaſhueroſh, the Husband of Queen Heſter.

THeſe Ægyptian troubles being ended, the Reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by ſome reſtrained into twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty, ſome allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much Humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleneſs. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews, as appeareth by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and aid to that great Work of Building the Temple, it were a needleſs travel; conſidering that all the late Divines have taking very much pain, to ſhew, That thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that Building, in ſuch ſort as appears in their Writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſhueroſh who Married Heſter. Whereof if it be needful to give proof, it may ſuffice; That Ahaſhueroſh lived in Suſa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt have been a Perſian; That he lived in Peace, as appears by the circumſtances of the Hiſtory, and uſed the Counſel of the ſeven Princes, the Authority of which Princes began under Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyſes.

The continual Wars which exerciſed King Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, together with the certainty of his Marriages with ſundry Wives, from none of whom he was Divorced, but left his firſt Wife Atoſſa, the Daughter of Cyrus, alive in great Honour, ſhe being Mother to Xerxes the ſucceeding King; do manifeſtly prove that Heſter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perſwaſion of Mardochæus, Joiachim the High Prieſt, the Son of Jeſua, cauſed the Feaſt of Purim to be inſtituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Joiachim was in the Reign of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Eſdras and Nehemias: Jeſua his Father dying about the end of Darius.

The ſame continuance of Wars, with other his furious and Tragical Loves, wherewith Xerxes did conſume ſuch little time as he had free from War, are enough to prove, that the ſtory of Heſter pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Abaſuerus or Artaſaſtha is expreſſed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known, that Xerxes in the ſeventh year of his Reign (wherein this Marriage muſt have been celebrated) came not near to Suſa. Of the Princes that ſucceeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahaſhueroſh, it is enough to ſay, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hieruſalem Captive, with Jechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived unto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Suſa, Reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in Peace, was contemporary with Joiachim the High Prieſt: And further, he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the Rebellious Ægyptians in that ſeventh year of his Reign; which good fortune might well give occaſion to ſuch a Royal Feaſt as is deſcribed in the beginning of the Book of Heſter. This is the ſumm of the Arguments, brought to prove the Age of Heſter's ſtory by the learned and diligent Krentzheimius, who adds the Authorities of Joſephus, affirming the ſame, and of Philo, giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Iſaac the Patriarch lived; namely, one hundred fourſcore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we ſuppoſe him to have been carried away Captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

§. VIII.

Of the Troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponneſian War.

BUT it is fit that we now return to the Affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently proſecuting their Civil Wars, ſuffered the Perſians for many Ages to reſt in Peace, this Ægyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedæmonians undertook the War, called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Iſle of Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the ſame, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the Baniſhed Bœotians re-entred their own Land, and maſtered two of their own Towns poſſeſs'd by the Athenians, which they ſoon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locreans, (Nations oppreſt by the Athenians) ſet upon them with ſuch reſolution, as the Athenians were in that Fight all ſlain or taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former Liberty, reſtoring to the Athenians their Priſoners. The Iſlanders of Eubœa took ſuch Courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertiſed that the Megarians (who firſt left the Lacedæmonians, and ſubmitted themſelves to Athens) being now weary of their Yoke, had ſlain the Athenian Gariſons, and joyned themſelves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. Theſe News haſtened Pericles homeward with all poſſible ſpeed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponneſians, led by Pliſtoanax, the Son of Pauſanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whoſe return Pericles went on with his firſt intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of Peace with the Peloponneſians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponneſus; and this Truce was made for thirty years. After ſix of theſe years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mileſians againſt the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulſes, and ſome great loſſes, both both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc'd to yield themſelves upon moſt lamentable Conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their Ships, to break down their own Walls, to pay the charge of the War, and to reſtore whatſoever had been taken by themſelves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruel Peloponneſian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following; the ſame contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But becauſe there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this War, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the Quarrel, I hold it convenient now at the firſt to ſhew briefly the eſtate of the Country at that time, and eſpecially the condition of thoſe two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the reſt had moſt dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponneſian War.

§. I.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, ſtood, at the beginning of the Peloponneſian War.

GREECE was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Eſtate, until Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Union and League againſt the Perſian, whereof they were Captains, than into any abſolute ſubjection. For every Eſtate held their own, and were Governed by Laws far different, and by their own Magiſtrates, notwithſtanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield Obedience no otherwiſe than as to ſuch, who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Perſian War (deemed the General Quarrel of Greece) and took the Profit and Honour of the Victory to their own uſe and increaſe of greatneſs. But the Kings which afterwards Reigned in Macedonia, did ſo far enlarge their Authority, that all Greece was by them brought under ſuch Obedience, as differed little from Servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, ſometimes with Arms, and ſometimes with gifts, preſerve their Liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief: which two People deſerved beſt the Plague of Tyranny, having firſt given occaſion thereunto, by their great Ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetual War. For until theſe two Cities of Athens and Sparta diſtracted all Greece, drawing every State into the Quarrel, on the one or other ſide, and ſo gave beginning to the Peloponneſian War (the effects whereof in true eſtimation ceaſed not, before the time that Philip had overmaſter'd all, foraſmuch as every concluſion of one War afforded henceforth matter to ſome new diſtraction of the whole Country) the Wars, commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All Controverſies were ſoon decided, either by the Authority of the Amphictiones, who were the General Council of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whoſe Aid was commonly held as good as the aſſurance of Victory.

Theſe Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government, when the Peloponneſian War began. Their Education was only to practiſe feats of Arms; wherein they ſo excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other People. They were poor, and cared not much for Wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common Field, which ſufficed to maintain him in ſuch manner of life as they uſed. For Bravery they had none, and curious Building or Apparel they regarded not. Their Diet was ſimple, their Feaſts and ordinary Meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They uſed Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, ſave that they uſed no other Occupation than War, placing all their Felicity in the glory of their Valour. Hereby it came to paſs that in all Enterpriſes, whereof they were partakers, the Leading and High Command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their Conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this: For they ſought Wealth, and meaſured the Honours of their Victories by the Profit; they uſed mercenary Souldiers in their Wars, and exacted great Tribute of their Subjects, which were for the moſt part Iſlanders, compelled to obey them, becauſe the Athenian Fleet was great.

As in form of Policy, and in courſe of Life, ſo in Conditions Natural, the difference between theſe two People was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, ſudden in their concluſions, and as haſty in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very ſlow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very reſolute, and ſuch as would in cold Bloud perform what the Athenians did uſually in flagrant. Whereby it came to paſs that the Lacedæmonians had all the Eſtates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and aſſured, that ſought Honour and not Riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by ſuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ſtraight ſubjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, until ſuch time as the Perſian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a Quarrel to Athens. For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended againſt his great Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand Men, beſtowed all their Wealth upon a Navy, and (aſſiſted by the other Grecians) overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whoſe Land-forces were ſoon after diſcomfited by them, and the Greeks, who all ſerved under conduct of the Spartans. After theſe Victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Iſlands of the Greekiſh Seas under their Obedience; impoſing upon them a hard Tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persian; though indeed they employed their Forces chiefly, to the Conquest of such Islands, and Haven-Towns, of their own Country-men, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousie, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Platæans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other Aid, than this Advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be entangled in a long and tedious War with their Neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their Force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to increase their Honour and Puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into War.

NEvertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that City grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the People of the Island Corcyra, their Colony, which had Rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their Fleet by adjoyning that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that Revenge which else they would have taken. Now, howsoever it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the Conditions of Peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-do) they concluded to redress by War the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking Religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain Offences committed against the Gods; whereto having for Answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like Offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deal plainly, and required that the People of some Towns, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at Liberty; and that a Decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtain it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their Reputation without entring into a War, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needful to the War; wherein the Lacedæmonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and having the general favour, as men that pretended to set at Liberty such as were oppressed: But the Athenians did as far exceed them in all Provisions, of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of Command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readiness of Friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily Assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

THE first and second years expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted; the Trees cut down; the Country People driven to flie, with their Wives, Children, and Cattel, into the Town; whereby a most furious Pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Isle of Lesbos, and the Siege of Platæa their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great Forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide, until Victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the People to issue into the Field against them; for they knew the Valour of their Enemies; but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilest they were making War in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Town of Platæa, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene, which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War, the Lacedæmonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such Enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all Necessaries, which came by Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken Field, which was to them a pattern of the Calamities, with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better Ships; and were so skilful in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for Peace. A Fleet of Athenian Ships, bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the Coast of Laconia, Laconia, and all the half Isle of Peloponnesus, was by contrary Winds detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the Main, by a straight neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Island of less than two miles compass, and within that a Creek, which is a good Harbour for Ships, the force of Weather being born off by the Head-Land and Isle. This Promontory the Athenians fortified, as well as in hast they might; and what was wanting in their Artificial Fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of Ground and Haven, they reasonably expected many advantages against their Enemies. For the Country adjoyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruel War with Sparta; and, though quite subdued, they were held in straight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the near neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore, it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this Haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and wast it at their pleasure. The News of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all hast out of Attica, which they had entred a few days before with their whole Army: But now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy, to recover this piece, which how bad a Neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-saw, little fearing the grievous loss at hand, which they there in few days received. For when they in vain made a general Assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence; they occupied the Haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Island before mentioned; at each end whereof is a Channel, that leads into the Port, but so narrow, that only two Ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight Ships could enter at once by the further Channel, between the Island and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their Fleet to fetch Wood, and other stuff, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season, the Athenian Fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the Haven, did break and sink many of their Enemies Vessels; took five, and enforced the residue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Island as good as lost: Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to advise what were best for the Publick safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their Enemies; they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about Peace, taking Truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The Conditions of the Truce were, That the Lacedæmonians should deliver up all the Ships which were in the Coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the Camp: That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no Ships should pass into the Island secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedæmonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of Peace; and should bring them back, at whose return the Truce should end; which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly void in all: That when the Truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian Ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were in opinion, that as they themselves had begun the War, so might they end it when they pleased: Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for Peace; advising them to make an end of War, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For in stead of concluding upon even terms, or desiring of meet recompence for loss sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this War began; refusing likewise to continue the Treaty of Peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred unto them as Prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the Truce being ended, it was desired of the Athenian Captains, that they should, according to their Covenant, restore the Ships, which had been put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the Truce was, That if any one Article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the Ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far over-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to use many hard means, for conveyance of Victuals into the Isle, which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried Prisoners to Athens; where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these Prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were now so far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coast, and by those who issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a Peace, that was not well kept.

THerefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain Peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with the continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicily, to hold up a Faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians Quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or loss; they banished the Captains, as if it had been meerly through their default, that the Isle of Sicily was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self; no whit inferiour unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by by ſome diſaſters received, eſpecially in Thrace, where in a Battel, which they loſt at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Braſidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian Forces, were both ſlain; which two had moſt been Adverſaries to the Peace. As the Athenians by their loſſes were taught moderation; ſo the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like Wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Pylus, were fain to proceed lamely in the War, againſt ſuch as, through commodity of their good Fleet, had all advantages that could be found in expedition, were fervently deſirous to conclude the buſineſs, ere Fortune by any new favour ſhould revive the inſolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a conſideration of their preſent eſtate, that urged them to bring the Treaty of Peace to good and ſpeedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their Heads, and ready to fall on them, which unleſs they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The Eſtate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a Truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their preſent troubles, by joyning with thoſe who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and ſtrong City, which though inferiour to Sparta in Valour, yet was not ſo unwarlike, nor held ſuch ill correſpondence with the neighbouring Eſtates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little elſe to do. This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded: For it was then thought that by waſting the Territory of Athens with Sword and Fire, the Quarrel ſhould eaſily, and in ſhort time have been ended; whereby not only the Athenians ſhould have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whoſe ſake the War was undertaken, have been ſo firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of thoſe hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelves by a ſtrong Fleet, from any great harm: That the Peloponneſians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Maſters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither War nor Peace; their daily Travels, and many Loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to uſe the occaſion, which the inclination of their Enemies did then afford, of making a final Peace; which with much ado they procured, as ſeemed equal and eaſie; but were indeed impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The reſtitution of Priſoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won abſolutely. For they had reſtored ſome Towns to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at Liberty (as reaſon required) which had opened their Gates unto them, as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as Enemies. Now, concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give ſome ſatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the War; as for the reſt, they promiſed more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned; neither would they by any means yield themſelves into the hands of their old Lords, the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithſtanding whatſoever Articles were drawn, and concluded, for their ſecurity, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of Conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring only the Priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt, until ſuch time as they might receive the full ſatisfaction according to the Agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open Quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtraight Alliance with the Athenians; making a League Offenſive and Defenſive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardneſs of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have ſued for Peace at their hands, as ſoon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did ſhew themſelves plainly unwilling to give ear to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure work; the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deſerving in the late War, or found ſo troubleſome, that their Enmity (if perhaps they durſt let it appear) were little worſe than Friendſhip. It bred great jealouſie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive ſuch a conjunction between two ſo powerful Signories; eſpecially one clauſe threatning every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of ſubduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For beſides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual conſent add new Conditions, or alter the old at their own pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their profeſſed Enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjuſt Friends; whereby it came to paſs, that they who had lately born chief ſway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the diſcretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wiſely uſed the advantage.

§. VI.

Of the Negotiations, and Practices, held between many States of Greece, by occaſion of the Peace that was concluded.

THE admiration wherein all Greece held the Valour of Sparta as unreſiſtable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been ſo exceſſive, that when by ſome ſiniſter accidents, that City was compelled to take and ſeek Peace, upon terms not ſounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens uſually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his Weapons, and yield himſelf Priſoner; nor that any misfortune could have been ſo great, as ſhould have drawn that City to relieve it ſelf otherwiſe than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom whom were ſome of eſpecial mark, being over-laid by Enemies, in the Iſland before Pylus, had rather choſen to live in Captivity, than to die in Fight; and that Pylus it ſelf, ſticking as a Thorn in the foot of Laconia, had bred ſuch anguiſh in that Eſtate, as utterly wearying the accuſtomed Spartan reſolution, had made it ſit down, and ſeek to refreſh it ſelf by diſhonourable eaſe: Then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive baſely of thoſe men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other leſſer Cities joyning with theſe in the ſame opinion, did caſt their Eyes upon the rich and great City of Argos, of whoſe ability, to do much, they conceived a ſtrong belief, becauſe of long time it had done nothing. Such is the baſe condition, which through fooliſh envy is become almoſt natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiouſly ſearch into their vices, in whom, had they kept ſome diſtance, we ſhould have diſcerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriouſly our beſt parts with their worſt, are juſtly plagued with a falſe opinion of that good in ſtrangers which we know to be wanting to our ſelves.

The firſt that publiſhed their diſlike of Sparta, were the Corinthians, at whoſe vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatneſs of Athen's daily increaſing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the preſent War. But theſe Corinthians did only murmur at the Peace, alledging as grievances, that ſome Towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantinæans, who during the time of War, had procured ſome part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forſake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily diſcover themſelves; fear of revenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already paſt. The Argives feeling the gale of proſperous Fortune that began to fill their Sails, prepared themſelves to take as much of it as they could ſtand under; giving for that purpoſe unto twelve of their Citizens, a full and abſolute Commiſſion to make Alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular buſineſs to the multitude. When the Gates of Argos were thus ſet open to all commers; the Mantinæans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponneſus following them, entred into this new Confederacy; ſome incited by private reſpects, others thinking it the wiſeſt way to do as the moſt did. What inconvenience might ariſe to them by theſe courſes, the Lacedæmonians eaſily diſcerned; and therefore ſent Embaſſadors to ſtop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the miſchief had been hatched. Theſe Embaſſadors found in the Corinthians a very rough diſpoſition, with a gravity expreſſing the opinion which they had conceived of their preſent advantage over Sparta. They had cauſed all Cities which had not entred yet into the Alliance with Argos, to ſend their Agents to them, in whoſe preſence they gave Audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whoſe Embaſſy was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their Oath, could not forſake the Alliance, which they had long ſince made with Sparta, and that reaſon did as well bind them to hold themſelves contented with the Peace lately made, as Religion enforced them to continue in their ancient Confederacy; foraſmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their Aſſociates, that the conſent of the greater part, (which had yielded unto Peace with Athens) ſhould bind the leſſer number to perform what was concluded, if no Divine impediment withſtood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made anſwer, that the Spartans had firſt begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the War wherein they had loſt many places, without proviſion of reſtitution; and that the very clauſe, alledged by the Embaſſadors, did acquit them from any neceſſity of ſubſcribing to the late Peace; foraſmuch as they had ſworn unto thoſe People whom they perſwaded to rebel againſt Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly ſuffer them to fall again into the Tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themſelves bound both in Reaſon and Religion, to uſe all means of upholding thoſe, whom by common conſent they had taken into protection; for that an Oath was no leſs to be accounted a Divine impediment, than were Peſtilence, Tempeſt, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the Alliance with Argos, they ſaid, that they would do as they ſhould find cauſe. Having diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with this Anſwer, they made all haſt to joyn themſelves with Argos, and cauſed other States to do the like; ſo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themſelves, the Thebans and Megarians being alſo upon the point to have entred into this new Confederacy. But as the affections were divers, which cauſed this haſty confluence of ſudden Friends to Argos, it ſo likewiſe came to paſs, that the friendſhip it ſelf, ſuch as it was, had much diverſity both of ſincerity and of continuance. For ſome there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians; as the Mantinæans and Eleans: theſe did firmly betake themſelves to the Argives, in whom they knew the ſame affection to be inveterate; others did only hate the Peace concluded; and theſe would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians in Peace: Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themſelves, dealt with them to enter into the Society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different forms of Government, uſed in Thebes and Argos, cauſed the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with ſuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This buſineſs having ill ſucceeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themſelves of their own danger, who had not ſo much as any Truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They ſought therefore to come to ſome temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City, that ſhewed againſt them more ſtomach than force; but gave them to underſtand, that they might be ſafe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of that Alliance, which Athens had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally, they granted unto theſe Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themſelves dependants of Sparta) the Truce that they deſired; but into private Confederacy they would not admit them, it being an Article of the League between them and the Spartans, That the one ſhould not make Peace nor War without the other.

Herein, as in many other paſſages, may clearly be ſeen the great advantage which abſolute Lords have as well in Peace as in War, over ſuch as are ſerved by voluntaries. We ſhall hardly find any one Signory, that hath been ſo conſtantly followed as Sparta was, by ſo many States, and ſome of them little inferiour to it ſelf, being all as free: Whereas contrariwiſe, the Athenians had lately, and by compulſive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themſelves as Tyrants. But in performance of Conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up ſuch places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For ſuch Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reſtored without their conſent, which had them in preſent poſſeſſion; and particularly the Town of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earneſtly deſired it, that by reſtitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earneſtly demanding it, themſelves might recover Pylus) unleſs they would agree to make a private Alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were fain to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the laſt Agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one Article of the League made between them and the Athenians, that by ſo doing they might enable themſelves to the performance of another, were ſhamefully diſappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Panacte, till firſt they had utterly demoliſhed it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was ſought to have been excuſed by the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had ſent home all Priſoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle words to ſalve the matter; ſaying, That from henceforth no Enemy to Athens ſhould neſtle in Panacte, for it was deſtroyed. But theſe Embaſſadors had not to deal with tame Fools: For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal Conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but uſed ſuch baſe colluſion as ſtood not with their Honour; having made private Alliance with the Thebans, having deſtroyed a Town that they ſhould have reſtored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded Peace. Hereupon they diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds ro anger thoſe that ſent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the Peace; among whom were the Ephori, choſen for that year, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though deſiring to renew the War, yet wiſhed that firſt they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Covenant, eſpecially Pylus, that had ſo ſorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whoſe Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the People, made him deſire War, as the means, whereby himſelf might procure ſome Honourable Employment, uſed all means to ſet the Quarrel on foot, whilſt the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought ſave their Priſoners, and pretence enough to uſe that advantage of breaking the Peace, by reaſon that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed againſt their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians ſhould, and might require, until they had firſt, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereunto they were bound, even to the utmoſt point. This was enough to make them ſweat, who having already done the moſt that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens which were Priſoners. But Alcibiades wiſhing a ſpeedy beginning of open War, ſent privily to the Argives, and gave them to underſtand how fitly the time ſerved for them to aſſociate themſelves with Athens, which was enough to give them ſecurity againſt all Enemies.

The Argives upon the firſt Confluence of many Eſtates unto their Society, had embraced great hopes of working Wonders, as if they ſhould have had the Conduct of all Greece againſt the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that Honour, as having ill uſed it, and thereby leaving their old Enemies in caſe of much contempt and diſability. But theſe ſudden apprehenſions of vain Joy, were ſuddenly changed into as vain Fear; which ill agreed with the great Opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refuſed their Alliance; when the Corinthians had ſought Security from Athens; and when a falſe Rumour was noiſed abroad, that Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full Agreement upon all Points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their Creſts, and ſue for Peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their Gravity, and were not over haſty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the Meſſage of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now conſulting how to become the Chief of all others, but how to ſave themſelves. Wherefore they ſent away preſently to Athens, their own Embaſſadors accompanied with the Mantinæans and Eleans, to make a League offenſive and defenſive, between their Eſtates and the Athenians.

Of this buſineſs the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they ſaw, that ſuch a Combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were deſirous to prevent it; but to keep the Love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done than ſtood with their Honour or Profit; others held it the wiſeſt way, having done ſo much, not to ſtick upon a little more, but rather by giving full ſatisfaction to retain the Friendſhip of that State, which was more to be valued than all the reſt of Greece. This Reſolution prevailing, they ſent away ſuch of their Citizens as were beſt affected to the Peace, who coming to Athens with full Commiſſion to make an end of all Controverſies, did earneſtly labour in the Council-Houſe, to make the truth of things appear; ſaying, that their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the Recovery of Panacte: concerning which Town, or any other buſineſs, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians, to ſee things fall out in ſuch wiſe as might give to the Athenians cauſe of diſpleaſure; but that all ſhould be done which in reaſon might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpoſe they ſhewed that themſelves had abſolute Commiſſion. Wherefore they deſired that Pylus might be reſtored unto them, and eſpecially for the preſent, that the Negotiation with the Argives might be called aſide. Favourable Audience was given to this Propoſition, the rather, becauſe they which promiſed amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good Agreement was daſht on the ſudden, by the practiſe of Alcibiades, who ſecretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, perſwaded them well of his Friendſhip towards their City, and adviſed them to take all care that their abſolute Power to conclude what they pleaſed in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens, leſt the infoinsolent Multitude should thereupon grow peremptory, and yield to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable Conditions. The Embassadors believed him, and fashioned their Tale in the Assembly of the People as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity, that were come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the People from strengthening themselves with Friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own Alliance, as (contrary to their Oath) already they had the Thebans. The People of Athens, whom a pleasing Errand would hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good Opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest Meanings had so ill been seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the League with Argos. Yet for the present, so far did Nicias, an Honorable Citizen, and great Friend to the Peace, prevail with them, that the Business was put off, till he himself with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may seem a great Wonder, how so poor a Trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the Load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth. But the Gravity which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their Game handsomly against so nimble a Wit; and they might well have been thought untrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and unsay for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sower Message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all Conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to rebuild Panacte, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into Confederacy with the Argives and their Adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured Friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the Anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate they would do no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable Friend, who would not seem to have effected nothing) swear anew to keep the Articles of the League between them and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadors, a new League was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common Friends and Enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this Confederacy did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (Prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the loss of Reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortunes, than in sundry Passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whose Amity, they had left sundry of their old Friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians, by the Treaty of Peace, had recovered the most of that which they lost in War; all their Gettings they had retained, and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their Fellows had found Business wherewith to set the Athenians on work, and make use of this Conjunction. For presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hostility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did not (as Principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their several Friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other People of Greece, began anew to range themselves under the Lacedæmonians; and follow their Ensigns. One Victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer Valour in a set Battel near to Mantinæa, against the Argive side, helped well to repair their decaied Reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civil dissention arising shortly after within Argos it self, between the principal Citizens and the Commons, had almost thrown down the whole frame of the new Combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a League with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so far as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in expres words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the Multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobility, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these Uproars in Peloponnesus, many Assaies were made to raise up Troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose Forces and readiness for Execution prevented some things, revenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter for quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet, retaining still that Enmity in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not as yet breaking out into terms of open War.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sack Siracuse, are put to flight and utterly discomfitted.

DUring this intermission of open War the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicil, whether they sent a Fleet so mighty as never was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all Necessaries to so great an Expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the Factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that Voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to banish himself, for fear of such Judgment, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed People; partly by the Invasion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whileſt the Forces of that State were ſo far from home. Hereunto was added the Aid of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponneſians with Money.

Neither was the ſucceſs of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that War. For although in the beginning, the enterpriſe had ſo well ſucceeded, that they Beſieged Syracuſe, the chief City of the Iſland, and one of the faireſt Towns which the Greeks Inhabited, obtaining the better in ſundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with ſtrong Aid from Peloponneſus, it came to paſs that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe, that their Fleet was ſhut up into the Haven of Syracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian Affairs went very ill in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand upon hard terms, for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accuſtomed to make weariſom yearly Journeys into Attica, which having pilled and foraged, they returned home; did now by Counſel of Alcibiades, (who ſeeking Revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceaſed not with daily excurſions to harry all the Country round about, and ſometimes give Alarm unto the City it ſelf.

In theſe extremities, the perverſe obſtinacy of the Athenians was very ſtrange; who leaving at their backs, and at their own doors, an Enemy little leſs mighty than themſelves, did yet ſend forth another Fleet into Sicil, to invade a People no leſs puiſſant, which never had offended them.

It often happens that proſperous events makes fooliſh Counſel ſeem wiſer than it was, which came to paſs many times among the Athenians, whoſe vain conceits Pallas was ſaid to turn unto the beſt. But where unſound advice, finding bad proof, is obſtinately purſued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be juſtly blamed for a miſerable iſſue. This ſecond Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have ſerved to convey home the former, that was defeated; after ſome attempts made to ſmall purpoſe againſt the Syracuſans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquiſhed, and bar'd up into the Haven of Syracuſe, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for ſuccour or departure, was driven to break up and flie away by Land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed, and quite overthrown in ſuch wiſe, that ſcarce any man eſcaped.

This miſchief well deſervedly fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into Exile, Sophocles and Pthiodorus, Generals, formerly ſent into that Iſle, pretending that they had taken money for making Peace in Sicil; whereas indeed there was not any means or poſſibility to have made War. Hereby it came to paſs, that Nicias, who had the chief Command in this unhappy enterpriſe, did rather chooſe to hazard the ruine of his Country, by the loſs of that Army, wherein conſiſted little leſs than all the power of Athens, than to adventure his own Eſtate, his Life, and his Honour, upon the Tongues of ſhameleſs accuſers, and the ſentence of Judges before his Tryal reſolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuſe, when wiſdom and neceſſity required it. For (ſaid he) they ſhall give ſentence upon us, who know not the reaſon of our doings, nor will give ear to any that would ſpeak in our behalf; but altogether hearken to ſuſpitious and vain rumours that ſhall be brought againſt us; yea, theſe our Souldiers, who now are ſo deſirous to return in ſafety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleaſure of the lewd and inſolent multitude.

This reſolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an Honeſt and Valiant man, to do what Reaſon willeth, not what Opinion expecteth; and to meaſure Honour or Diſhonour by the aſſurance of his well-informed Conſcience, rather than by the malicious report and cenſure of others) yet it may be excuſed; ſince he had before his eyes the injuſtice of his People, and had well underſtood that a wicked Sentence is infinitely worſe than a wicked Fact, as being held a preſident and pattern, whereby Oppreſſion beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was ſuch, as a conſtant man could not eaſily have over-maſtered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of ſafety than the faint hope of a ſecret flight, he was ſo terrified with an Eclipſe of the Moon, happening when they were about to diſlodge, that he would not conſent to have the Camp break up till ſeven and twenty days were paſt. His timorouſneſs was even as fooliſh and ridiculous, as the iſſue of it was lamentable. For he ſhould not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the courſe of Nature would be as unjuſt as his Athenians; or might pretend leſs evil to the ſlothful, than to ſuch as did their beſt. Neither do I think that any Aſtrologer can alledge this Eclipſe, as either a cauſe or prognoſtication of that Armies deſtruction, otherwiſe than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confuſion. Had C. Caſſius, the Roman, he, who ſlew Julius Cæſar, imitated this Superſtition of Nicias, he had ſurely found the ſame fortune in a caſe very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Craſſus his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was adviſed, upon ſuch an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were paſt the Sign of Scorpio; he made anſwer, that he ſtood not in ſuch fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made ſuch a ſafe and honourable retreat, as did both ſhew his noble reſolution, and give a fair example to that good rule,

Thus we ſee that God, who ordinarily works by concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of underſtanding, when he intends evil to the multitude; and that the wickedneſs of unjuſt men is the ready mean to weaken the vertue of thoſe who might have done them good.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great loſs of the Fleet and Army in Sicilia.

THE loſs of this Army was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompted a very little leſs calamity to that Eſtate, than was the ſubverſion of the Walls, when the City about ſeven years after was taken by Lyſander. For now began the Subjects of the Athenian Eſtate to rebel; of whom, ſome they reduced under their Obedience, others held out; ſome for fear of greater inconvenience were ſet at Liberty, promiſing only to be their good Friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and per-perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principal men of Athens being wearied with the Peoples insolency, took upon them to change the form of that Estate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the form of an Aristocraty in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slain at Athens, the Commonalty were so dismay'd that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not; but every man was afraid of his Neighbour, lest he should be a member of the League. In this general fear the Majesty of Athens was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the People, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give consent; for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the Murder. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authority, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Army, which then was at the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of Banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised unto the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his Service done to that State was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Counsel and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his Wit and Valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his vertue; especially Agis, one of their Kings, whose Wife had so far yielded her self to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward Friends she could not forbear to call her young Child by his Name. Hereupon order was taken that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan Treachery, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great Beauty, sweet Conversation, and sound Wit, that he soon became the Master of that Barbarous Vice-roy's affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsel he made way to other practises, wherein by strength of his Reputation (as the only Favourite of so great a Potentate) he plaid his own Game, procuring his restitution. At length his Banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the Tyranny whereof they were partakers; partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being less regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain Peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own Authority, and the greatness of their City, if they might; but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safety at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of Peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was Governed by an Aristocraty, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chief of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield some fair opportunity to the destruction of it self, which in effect (though not then presently) came to pass. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his Forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navy of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their Wisdom, they should rather have forborn to present unto the City, or to the Countries near adjoyning any terror of the War. For the dissention within the Walls might soon have done more hurt than could be received from the Fleet or Army without; which indeed gave occasion to set the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were fain to resign their Authority, which they could not now hold, when the People having taken Arms to repel Foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full restitution of the Soveraign Command unto the People, or whole Body of the City, but only to five thousand; which Company the four hundred (when their Authority began) had pretended to take unto them as Assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should be recalled from Exile; and that the Army at Samos should be requested to undertake the Government; which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades won many important Victories for the Athenians, was recalled from Exile, made their General, and again deposed.

THis establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Wars.

Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the ſame time overthrown at Sea, in a great Battel, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos; to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning ſuch Forces as he could raiſe, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydus, his arrival with eighteen Ships gave the Honour of a great Battel to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly deſtroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus, took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranſom their City, and fortified Chryſopolis. Hereupon Letters were ſent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to contain the diſtreſs of the Army in theſe few words: All is loſt, Mindarus is ſlain, the Souldiers want Victuals, we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedæmonians in Fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, beſieged and wan Byzantium, now called Conſtantinople, which even in thoſe days was a goodly, rich, and very ſtrong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcom, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his Honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driven to Baniſh himſelf again; only becauſe his Lieutenant, contrary to the expreſs command of Alcibiades, fighting with the Enemies in his abſence, had loſt a great part of the Fleet.

The ſecond Baniſhment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the firſt; and the loſs which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) leſs to be pitied of others, than that which enſued upon his former Exile. For whereas at the firſt, he had ſought revenge upon his own City; now, as inured to Adverſity, he rather pitied their fury, who in time of ſuch danger had caſt out him that ſhould have repaired their weak Eſtate, than ſought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his People, to comfort himſelf after injury received. Before they, who were inſtituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he preſented Battel to Lyſander the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not ſo confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alcibiades himſelf, bringing Ships more in number (notwithſtanding the former loſs of fifteen) than his Enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the People was publiſhed in the Navy, then did Alcibiades withdraw himſelf to a Town upon Helleſpont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Caſtle.

§. XI.

The Battel at Arginuſæ, and Condemnation of the Victorious Athenian Captains by the People.

After this time the Athenians, receiving many loſſes and diſcomfitures, were driven to flie into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were ſtraightly Beſieged both by Land and Sea. For the raiſing of this Siege neceſſity enforced them to Man all their Veſſels, and to put the uttermoſt of their Forces into the hazard of one Battel. This Battel was fought at Arginuſæ, where Callicratidas, Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, loſing the honour of the day, preſerved his own Reputation by dying valiantly in the Fight. It might well have been expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had Command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, ſhould for that good days Service, and ſo happy a Victory, have received great Honour of their Citizens. But contrariwiſe they were forthwith called home, and accuſed, as if wilfully they had ſuffered many of the Citizens, whoſe Ships were broken and ſunk, to be caſt away, when by appointing ſome Veſſels to take them up, they might have ſaved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very juſt anſwer; That they, purſuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet, under ſufficient men, to ſave thoſe that were wrackt; which if it were not well accompliſhed, it was, becauſe a Tempeſt ariſing about the end of the Fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuſe availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who ſaid, That he himſelf eſcaping in a Meal-tub, had been intreated by thoſe who were in peril of drowning, to deſire of the People revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very ſtrange, that upon ſuch an accuſation, maintained with ſo ſlender Evidence, men that had well deſerved of their Country, ſhould be overthrown. But their Enemies had ſo incenſed the raſcal multitude, that no man durſt abſolve them, ſave only Socrates the wiſe and vertuous Philoſopher, whoſe voice in this judgment was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly eſcaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other Veſſels in the Storm: but the Captains which were abſent eſcaped; for when the fury of the People was over-paſt, this judgment was reverſed, and the accuſers called into queſtion for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themſelves from the infamy of injuſtice; but the Divine Juſtice was not aſleep, nor would be ſo deluded.

§. XII.

The Battel at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponneſian War.

THE Peloponneſian Fleet under Lyſander, the year next following, having ſcowred the Ægean Seas, entred Helleſpont, where (landing Souldiers) it beſieged and took the Town of Lampſacus. Hereupon all the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourſcore Sail, made thither in haſte; but finding Lampſacus taken before their coming, they put in at Seſtos, where having refreſhed themſelves, they ſailed to the River, called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-brook, or the River of the Goat; being on the Continent, oppoſite to Lampſacus: and there they caſt Anchors, not one whole League off from Lyſander, who rode at Lampſacus in the Harbour. The next day after their arrival they preſented fight unto the Peloponneſians, who refuſed it; whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; and thus they continued five days, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own Harbour when it drew towards Evening.

The Caſtle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navy, and his power in thoſe places was ſuch as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made uſe of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making War in his own Name upon ſome People of the Thracians, had gathered much Wealth, and obtained much Reputation among them. He perceiving the diſorderly courſe of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and ſhewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not ſoon fore-ſee and prevent it. For they lay in a Road ſubject to every Weather, Weather, neither near enough to any Town where they might ſurniſh themſelves with neceſſaries; nor ſo far off as had been more expedient. Seſtos was the next Market-Town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners reſorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as ſoon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seſtos, which was not far off; or at the leaſt, to conſider better how near their Enemy was, whoſe fear proceeded rather from obedience to his General, than from any cowardiſe. This admonition was ſo far deſpiſed, that ſome of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his Authority was out of date. Had it not been for theſe opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might ſo have done, by tranſporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his followers, over the Straights, who aſſaulting the Peloponneſians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or elſe to leave their Ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good Counſel no better than hath been rehearſed, he left them to their fortune, which how evil it would be he did prognoſticate.

Lyſander all this while defending himſelf by the advantage of his Haven, was not careleſs in looking into the demeanor of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to ſend forth ſome of his ſwifteſt Veſſels after them, who obſerving their doings, related unto him what they had ſeen. Therefore underſtanding in what careleſs faſhion they romed up and down the Country, he kept all his men aboard after their departure, and the fift day gave eſpecial charge to his Scouts, That when they perceived the Athenians diſembarking, as their cuſtom was, and walking towards Seſtos, they ſhould forthwith return, and hang up a brazen Shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyſander being in a readineſs, made all ſpeed that ſtrength of Oars could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his Enemies aboard their Ships, not many near them, and all in great confuſion upon the news of his approach.

Inſomuch that the greateſt induſtry which the Athenians then ſhewed, was in the eſcape of eight or nine Ships, which knowing how much that loſs imported, gave over Athens as deſperate, and made a long flight unto the Iſle of Cyprus; all the reſt were taken, and ſuch of the Souldiers as came in to the reſcue cut in pieces. Thus was the War, which had laſted ſeven and twenty years, with variable ſucceſs, concluded in one hour; and the glory of Athens in ſuch wiſe Eclipſed, that ſhe never after ſhone again in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory, Lyſander, having taken in ſuch Towns as readily did yield upon the firſt fame of his exploit, ſet ſail for Athens, and joyning his Forces with thoſe of Agis and Pauſanias, Kings of Sparta, Summoned the City, which finding too ſtubborn to yield, and too ſtrong to be won on the ſudden, he put forth again to Sea; and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Iſlands, and ſuch Towns of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to ſubmit themſelves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all proviſion of Victuals, and other Neceſſaries, from the City, and enforced the People by meer Famine to yield to theſe Conditions. That the long Walls leading from the Town to the Port, ſhould be thrown down; That all Cities ſubject to their Eſtate, ſhould be ſet at liberty; That the Athenians ſhould be Maſters only of their own Territories, and the Fields adjoyning to their Town; And that they ſhould keep no more than twelve Ships; That they ſhould hold as Friends or Enemies, the ſame whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

Theſe Articles being agreed upon, the Walls were thrown down with great rejoycing of thoſe who had born diſpleaſure to Athens; and not without ſome conſultation of deſtroying the City, and laying waſte the Land about it. Which Advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the People, who recompenſed their former inſolency and injuſtice over their Captains, by oppreſſing them with all baſe and intolerable Slavery.

The only ſmall hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertiſed the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering in every quarter) ſoon effected his ſudden Death.

Such end had the Peloponneſian War. After which, the Lacedæmonians abuſing the Reputation, and great Power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to all Greece; and by Combination of many Cities againſt them, were diſpoſſeſſed of their High Authority, even in that very Age, in which they had ſubdued Athens. The greateſt foil that they took was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the beſt of his Education. By theſe Thebans, the City of Sparta (beſides other great loſſes received) was ſundry times in danger of being taken. But theſe haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the ſeveral Eſtates and Signories of Greece were grown ſo jealous one of anothers greatneſs; that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, which were the mightieſt, aſſociating themſelves with the weaker party, did ſo counterpoiſe the ſtronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her Juriſdiction ſo far as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly balanced, than well agreeing, till ſuch time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whoſe forefathers had been dependants, and followers, yea, almoſt meer Vaſſals to the Eſtates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making uſe of their Factions, to bring them all into Servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans preſenting them with a ſhew of Liberty, did themſelves indeed become their Maſters.

Of Matters concurring with the Peloponnesian War, or shortly following it.

How the Affairs of Persia stood in these Times.

DURING the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other less expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably injoyed a long Raign over the Persians, left it by his Death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Usurpers, and for their short Raign little to be regarded) place next unto him, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his Brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have been the Sons of Hester) held the Kingdom but one year between them, the younger succeeding his elder Brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the History of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsal of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be incident to the Affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second being a vitious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by Surfeit, then by Treachery of his as riotous Brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his Brother, and more Cruel, he slew unjustly Bagorazus a principal Eunuch, and would have done as much to his Brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could levy, seized at once upon the King and Kingdom. Darius having slain his Brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amyrtæus of Sais an Ægyptian rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himself so firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdom, and delivered it over to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the fury of their Civil Wars,) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his Son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a Subject of his own, and of the Royal blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great Calamity, before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Islanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Navy, without which it was impossible to advance the War against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driven to crave his assistance, which he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the League between him and them were set down in more precise terms, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make war joyntly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebel from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly been his or his Predecessors, should return to his Obedience. By this Treaty, and the War ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the City of Jasus; the Athenians wanting either Force or Courage to succour him. Nevertheless Ægypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian Forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted Manhood, which caused him to fight with Gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his natural Enemies, what the Valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his own Sister, who bare unto him (besides other Children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindful, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular Vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius intending to leave unto his elder Son Artaxerxes the Inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous Eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his Father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, had not his own Death prevented the coming of his younger Son, and placed the Elder in his Throne. Of the War between these Brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place most convenient to shew the Proceedings of the Greeks, after the subversion of the Walls of Athens, which gave end to that War called the Peloponnesian War, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from Civil Broils. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the People to compile a Body of their Law, and make a Collection of such ancient Statutes as were meetest to be put in practise: the Condition of the City standing as it did in that so sudden Alteration. To this Charge was annexed the supreme Authority, either as a Recompence of their Labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give Judgment in particular Causes, to whose Judgment the Laws themselvs, by which the City was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirty having so great Power in their hands, were more careful to hold it, than to deſerve it by faithful execution of that which was committed to them in truſt.

Therefore apprehending ſuch troubleſome Fellows, as were odious to the City, though not puniſhable therefore by Law, they condemned them to Death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who conſidered their lewd conditions, but did not withal bethink themſelves, how eaſie a thing it would be unto theſe thirty men, to take away the Lives of Innocents, by calling them Perturbers of the Peace, or what elſe they liſted, when Condemnation without due Tryal and Proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plauſibly entred into a wicked courſe of Government, they thought it beſt to fortifie themſelves with a ſure Guard, ere they brake out into thoſe diſorders, which they muſt needs commit for the eſtabliſhing of their Authority. Wherefore diſpatching two of their own Company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keep the City free from all rebellious Motions, to which purpoſe it behoved them to cut off ſuch as were ſeditious; and therefore deſired the Lacedæmonians to ſend them a Garriſon, which they promiſed at their own coſt to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard ſent, the Captain of which was ſo well entertained by the Thirty, that none of their miſdeeds could want his high Commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after baſe and deteſted Perſons, invaded the principal men of the City, ſending armed men from Houſe to Houſe, who drew out ſuch as were of great Reputation, and likely, or able, to make any Head againſt this wicked Form of Government: whereby there was ſuch effuſion of Blood, as to Theramenes (one of the Thirty) ſeemed very horrible, and unable to eſcape Vengeance. His diſlike of their proceedings being openly diſcovered, cauſed his Fellows to bethink themſelves, and provide for their own ſecurity, and his deſtruction, leſt he ſhould make himſelf a Captain of the diſcontented (which were almoſt the whole City) and redeem his own Peace with their Ruine. Wherefore they ſelected three thouſand of the Citizens, whom they thought meeteſt, and gave unto them ſome part of publique Authority, the reſt they diſarmed; and having thus increaſed their own ſtrength, and weakened their Oppoſites, they began afreſh to ſhed the Blood, not only of their private Enemies, but of ſuch whoſe Money or Goods might inrich them, and enable them for the Payment of their Guard. And to this purpoſe they concluded, that every one of them ſhould name one man upon whoſe Goods he ſhould ſeize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his deteſtation of ſo wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the Thirty was moſt tyrannical, accuſe him to the Council, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one main priviledge of the three thouſand was, that none of them ſhould ſuffer death at the appointment of the Thirty, but have the accuſtomed Tryal) he took upon him to ſtrike out of that number the Name of Theramenes, and ſo reduced him under the Tryal and Sentence of that Order. It was well alledged by Theramenes, that his Name was not more eaſie to be blotted out of the Catalogue than any other mans, upon which conſideration, he adviſed them all to conceive no otherwiſe of his Caſe, than as of their own, who were liable to the ſame form of proceeding; but (every man chooſing rather to preſerve his own life by ſilence, than preſently to draw upon himſelf the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him) the Tyrants interpreting ſilence as conſent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink Poiſon.

§. III.

The Conſpiracy againſt the thirty Tyrants, and their Depoſition.

After the Death of Theramenes, the Thirty began to uſe ſuch outrage, as excelled their former Villanies. For having three thouſand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or ſhame, deſpoiling them of Lands and Goods, and cauſing them to fly into Baniſhment for ſafeguard of their Lives. This Flight of the Citizens procured their Liberty, and the general Good of the City. For the baniſhed Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into conſultation, and reſolved to hazard their Lives in ſetting free the City of Athens. The very thought of ſuch a Practice had been Treaſon at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the Execution. Seaventy men, or thereabout, were the firſt undertakers, who with their Captain Thraſybulus took Phyla, a place of ſtrength in the Territory of Athens. No ſooner did the Thirty hear of their Exploit, than ſeek means to prevent further danger; aſſembling the three thouſand and their Lacedæmonian Guard, with which Force they attempted Phyla, but were with ſome loſs of their men repelled. Finding the place too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, they intended to beſiege it; which purpoſe came to nought by means of Snow that fell, and other ſtormy weather, againſt which they had not made proviſion. Retiring therefore to the City, which above all they were to make good, they left the moſt of their Guard, and two Companies of Horſe to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying Siege. But it was not long ere the Followers of Thraſybulus were encreaſed from ſeaventy to ſeven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon thoſe Guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twenty. Theſe ſmall, but proſperous beginnings, added more to the number of thoſe in Phyla, who now with a thouſand men got entrance into Piræus, the Suburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the Thirty had reſolved to fortifie the Town of Eleuſine, to their own uſe, whereinto they might make an eaſie retreat, and ſave themſelves from any ſudden Peril. It may well ſeem ſtrange, that whereas their barbarous manner of Government had brought them into ſuch danger, they were ſo far from ſeeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwiſe, to aſſure themſelves of Eleuſine, they got all of the place who could bear Arms into their hands by a Train, and wickedly (though under form of Juſtice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per ſcelera eſt iter, the miſchiefs which they had already done were ſuch as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of ſafety, than by extending their Cruelty unto all, ſeeing few or none were left, whom they could truſt. When Thraſybulus and his Fellows, who as yet were termed Conſpirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thouſand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to aſſault it; but in this Enterpriſe Thraſybulus had the better, and repelled his Enemies, of whom although there were ſlain to the number of ſeventy, only yet the Victory ſeemed the greater, becauſe Critias, and one other of the thirty, periſhed in that Fight. The death of Critias, and the ſtout defence of Piræum, together with ſome exhortations uſed by Thraſybulus to the Citizens, wrought ſuch effect, that the thirty were depoſed. Nevertheleſs there were ſo many of the three thouſand, who having communicated with the thirty in their miſdeeds, feared to be called to a ſharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be eſtabliſhed. For Embaſſadors were ſent to Sparta, who craving aid againſt Thraſybulus, and his followers, had favourable Audience, and a Power ſent to their aſſiſtance, both by Land and Sea, under the conduct of Lyſander, and his Brother; whom Pauſanias the Spartan King did follow, raiſing an Army of the Cities Confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared firſt the jealouſie, wherein ſome People held the State of Sparta. The Beotians and Corinthians, who in the late Wars had been the moſt bitter Enemies to Athens, refuſed to follow Pauſanias in this expedition; alledging that it ſtood not with their Oaths, to make War againſt that People, who had not hitherto broken any one Article of the League: but fearing, indeed, leſt the Lacedæmonians ſhould annex the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted that Pauſanias took this anſwer in good part. For it was not his purpoſe to deſtroy thoſe againſt whom he went, but only to croſs the proceedings of Lyſander, whom he envied. Therefore having in ſome ſmall skirmiſhes againſt them of Thraſybulus his party, made a ſhew of War, he finally wrought ſuch means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and ſuch others, as were like to give cauſe of Tumult, being ſent to Sparta. The remainder of that Tyrannical Faction, having withdrawn themſelves to Eleuſine, were ſhortly after found to attempt ſome innovation; whereupon the whole City riſing againſt them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parly, and ſlew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a Law was made, that all injuries paſt ſhould be forgotten, and no man called into queſtion for wrongs committed. By which Order, wiſely made, and carefully obſerved, the City returned to her former quietneſs.

CHAP. X.

Of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt againſt his Brother.

THE matters of Greece now ſtanding upon ſuch termes that no one Eſtate durſt oppoſe it ſelf againſt that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes, King of Perſia, having in his Fathers life time very carefully proſecuted the War againſt Athens, did ſend his Meſſengers to Sparta, requeſting that their love might appear no leſs to him, than that which he had ſhewed towards them in their dangerous War againſt the Athenians. To this requeſt, being general, the Lacedæmonians gave a ſutable anſwer, commanding their Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all Service that he ſhould require of him. If Cyrus had plainly diſcovered himſelf, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his aſſiſtance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Perſia ſhould have been the recompence of his deſerts; or that he periſhing in Battel, as after he did, the ſubverſion of that Empire had forthwith enſued. But it pleaſed God, rather to ſhew unto the Greeks the ways, which under the Macedonian Enſigns, the Victorious footſteps of their Poſterity ſhould meaſure; and opening unto them the Riches, and with all the Weakneſs of the Perſian, to kindle in them both deſire and hope of that Conqueſt, which he reſerved to another Generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whoſe hour was not yet come. The love which Paryſatis the Queen-Mother of Perſia bare unto Cyrus her younger Son, being ſeconded by the earneſt favour of the People, and ready deſires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince, in his Fathers Old Age to aſpire after the Succeſſion. But being ſent for by his Father (as hath before been ſhewed) whoſe meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder Brother Artaxerxes eſtabliſhed ſo ſurely by the old Kings favour, that it were not ſafe to attempt any means of diſplanting him, by whoſe diſfavour himſelf might eaſily loſe the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Aſia the leſs, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The neareſt Neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Aſia, was Triſſaphernes, a man compounded of Cowardiſe, Treachery, Craft, and all Vices which accuſtomably branch out of theſe. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, uſing by the way all fair ſhews of Friendſhip, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought that Queen Paryſatis had obtained the Inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true that Paryſatis had uſed the beſt of her endeavour to that purpoſe, alledging that (which in former Ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like diſceptation with his elder Brother) Artaxerxes was born whileſt his Father was a private Man, but Cyrus, when he was a Crowned King. All which not ſufficing; when the moſt that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of ſome preſumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning; then did this Triſſaphernes diſcover his Nature, and accuſe his Friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous Treaſon intended againſt his Perſon. Upon this Accuſation, whether true or falſe, very eaſily believed, Cyrus was Arreſted, and by the moſt vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and ſent back into his own Province.

§. II.

§. II.

The Preparations of Cyrus, and his first entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regal. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own Reputation; usually indeed with the Kings Enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own Heads were held only at the Kings pleasure; which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself, the Interest that he had in the Kingdom, the small assurance of his Brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late Imprisonment, and the means which he had by love of his own People, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it self; but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrel with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his Jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his Brothers hot spirit exercised in private Quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardise despised, although he durst not adventure to take Arms against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preserve his Reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take Arms, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great Policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoyning, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Græcian Captains with Money, who being very good men of War, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessaly, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to cross the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their several Wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continual exercise, and ready in Arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to Besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he levyed before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the less: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a People of Asia the less, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory, he raised the Siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levyed against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred Horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his Journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

THE Tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the War. But whilest the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haltened upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repair of his Country-men, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by tryal in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him Aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained an hundred thousand men; the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amain, the Victuallers and Baggagers forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his Brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the War against their will and dispositions; whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greeks to pass the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to seek excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great Enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of Reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greeks considering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might safely return if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perswaded to do as some had begun; and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an Army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in tryal of a plain Battel. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men had undertaken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong Wall, and other defences of Nature and Art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself towards the King Forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I do not find that this Cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp till five days were past after the Battel, received either punishment or disgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himself, were all made of the same metal.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, until by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the Enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp disputation of Title to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superiour in Reputation. By such advice the King resolved upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the Field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe as to be far distant from his Enemies.

§. IV.

The Battel between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evil ways, and scarcity of Victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being past this Trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, having bestowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vantcurrors brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their Battels in good order upon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their Enemies, whom they saw not till it was after noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were Marshalled, coming on very orderly, in silence; whereas it had been expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should have spent all their force upon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so unequal in distent, being all embattelled in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not with the corner and utmost point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his Battel, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: Then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own Manhood, which was not accustomed to make proof of it self, upon such excessive odds. It was almost incredible, that so great an Army should be so easily chased. Nevertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custom) to give charge upon their Enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their Nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greeks, all that beastly rabble of Cowards fled amain, without abiding the stroak, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with Hooks and Scythes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This base demeanor of his Enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus, and his followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had been assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the Field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greeks, and to set upon them in the rear, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a Squadron of six thousand which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captain thereof, Artagerses, with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troup, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the Field, could not contain himself, but said, I see the man; and presently with a small handful of men about him ran upon his Brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the Breast. Having given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the Eye with a Dart, thrown by a base Fellow; wherewith astonied, he fell dead from his Horse, or so hurt, that it was impossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes caused the Head and right Hand of his Brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his People, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings Troups, and utterly dismayed such Persian Captains, as were now, even in their own Eyes, no better than Rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes, making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the Battel of the Greeks, was ready now to joyn with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his Brothers death, been sufficient to countervail all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks would have yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwise, when he gave upon them, they opening their Battel, drave him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the Field, gave chase to all that came in their sight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in Rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek Honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his Brothers death had secured his Estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give Reputation to his Valour; and this Reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, by shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Spear. This Ensign might have encouraged his People, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so near them, with all their Power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the Spur, so that none remained in the place of Battel, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an Arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their Quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good Appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to Dine.

to

The hard Estate of the Greeks after the Fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark Night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left, that might serve for Food: so that wanting Victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary Bodies with Sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his People, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful deameanor of his Army, should live to carry Tidings Home, it would not be long ere with greater Forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry Tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave Message the next morning. Charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gate, to wait there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high Courages broken, upon report of his Brothers Death; but he was greatly deceived in that thought: For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Ariæus, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to return into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyn with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Ariæus, that having beaten the King out of the Field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Ariæus himself in the Kings Throne, if he would joyn with them, and pursue the Victory. Before they received any reply to this Answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose Errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would die ere he yielded to such a Motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the Victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of Friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their Kindness. To this question Phalinus a Græcian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their Throats, for which cause he accounted them his Prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilst they kept their Arms their Valour would be serviceable, but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their Bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying; This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty Speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his Wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and his Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a Business of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish Discourser. But his Wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known than that he brought an unhoneſt Message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Lives to the merciless Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principal Commanders were surprised by Treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the Wars before, undertook the Conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their service in Ægypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their Answer. Clearchus the General told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I understand you? as choosing Peace if we stay, otherwise War, said Clearchus. But whether War or Peace? quoth this politique Embassador. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they roasted with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets thrown away by their Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greeks began to return Homewards.

AT night they took their way towards Ariæus, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by four hundred Foot, and forty Horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they they been kindly uſed, it may well be thought that ſome of them ſhould have accompanied Tiſſaphernes, and ſerved as Stales to draw in the reſt. Ariæus being of too baſe a Temper and Birth, to to think upon ſeeking the Kingdom for himſelf, with ſuch aſſiſtance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleaſed to make Covenant with them for mutual aſſiſtance unto the laſt: Whereunto both parts having ſworn, he adviſed them to take another way homeward, which ſhould be ſomewhat longer, ye ſafer and fitter to relieve them with Victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome March, and tired the Soldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coaſted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purpoſed themſelves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, becauſe he would not ſeem by declining them to ſhew fear or weakneſs. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their Betters, it cannot be ſtrange to any that hath conſidered their former Behaviour; nor ſtrange, that the Græcians being weary and hungry, and lying among Enemies in an unknown Country, ſhould be very fearful; but it is almoſt paſt belief, that the Noiſe which was heard of theſe poor men, calling one to another tumultuouſly, as the preſent condition inforced them to do, ſhould make the Perſians fly out of their Camp, and ſo affright the great King, that in ſtead of demanding their Arms, he ſhould crave Peace of them. The next day very early, came Meſſengers from Artaxerxes, deſiring free acceſs for Embaſſadors to entreat of Peace. Were it not that ſuch particulars do beſt open the quality of the Perſons, by whom things were managed, I ſhould hold it fitter to run over the general paſſages of thoſe times, than to dwell among Circumſtances. But ſurely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Meſſengers to bid the King prepare for Battel, becauſe the Greeks (as he ſaid) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of Truce till their Bellies were full; Artaxerxes diſſembling the Indignity, was contented ſweetly to ſwallow down this Pill, ſending them Guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of Victuals to relieve them.

How Tiſſaphernes under colour of Peace, betraied all the Captains of the Greeks.

HItherto the Greeks relying upon their own Vertue, had rather advanced their Affairs, than brought themſelves into any ſtraights or terms of diſadvantage. But now came unto them the ſubtil Fox Tiſſaphernes, who circumventing the chief Commanders by fine ſlights, did miſchievouſly entrap them, to the extream danger of the Army. He told them that his Province lying near unto Greece, had cauſed him greatly to deſire that their Deliverance might be wrought by his Procurement; knowing well, that in time to come, both they and their Countrimen at home would not be unthankful for ſuch a Benefit. Herewithal he forgot not to rehearſe the great ſervice that he had done to his Maſter, being the firſt that advertiſed him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good ſtrength of men, but in the day of Battel ſhewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chaſe to the Barbarians that ſtood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you ſafe into Greece; in which Suit I have good hope to ſpeed, if you will ſend a mild anſwer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cauſe you have born Arms againſt him. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tiſſaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he ſaid) that Peace ſhould be granted: the Conditions whereof were; That they ſhould paſs freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they took, and committing no ſpoil: yet that it ſhould be lawful for them to take Victuals by force, in any place that refuſed to afford them an open Market. Hereunto both parties having ſworn, the League was concluded, and Tiſſaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all buſineſs, came unto them again after twenty days, and then they ſet forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tiſſaphernes did ſpend at the Court, miniſtred great occaſion of miſtruſt to his new Confederates. For beſides his long abſence, which alone ſufficed to breed doubt; the Brethren and Kindred of Ariæus repairing daily to him, and other Perſians to his Souldiers, did work him and them ſo with aſſurance of Pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more ſtrange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This cauſed many to adviſe Clearchus, rather to paſs forward as well as he might, than to rely upon Covenants, and ſit ſtill whileſt the King laid Snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perſwaded them to reſt contented whileſt they were well, and not to caſt themſelves again into thoſe Difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting withal their own Wants, and the Kings Means, but eſpecially the Oaths mutually given and taken, wherewith he ſaw no reaſon why the Enemy ſhould have clogged himſelf if he meant Miſchief, having Power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tiſſaphernes was a very honourable man (if Honour may be valued by Greatneſs and Place in Court) which cauſed his Oath to be the more eſteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or baſe reſpect was like to have drawn it from him. But his Falſhood was ſuch, both in ſubſtance and in ſucceſs, as may fitly expound that Saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich Man a Lyar. A lye may find excuſe when it grows out of fear: for that Paſſion hath his original from weakneſs. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, ſhall be made the ſupporter of Untruth, the Falſhood is moſt abominable; for the Offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own ſtrength againſt the Divine Juſtice, doth commit that ſin with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with ſure Vengeance. It was not long ere Tiſſaphernes found means to deſtroy all the Captains, whom he ſubtilly got into his Power by a Train; making the General Clearchus himſelf the mean to draw in all the reſt. The buſineſs was contrived thus: having travelled ſome days together, in ſuch wiſe, that the Perſians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great Familiarity appearing between Tiſſaphernes, and Ariæus; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tiſſaphernes his brains all cauſes of diſtruſt, whereof many had grown in that ſhort time. To which purpoſe obtaining private Conference with him, he rehearſed the Oath of Confe-

Confederacy, which had paſt between them, ſhewing how religiouſly he meant to keep it; and repeating the benefits, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tiſſaphernes, he promiſed that their love ſhould appear to him not unfruitful, if he would make uſe of their ſervice againſt the Myſians or Piſidians, who were accuſtomed to infeſt his Province; or againſt the Ægyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cauſe he deſired him, that whereas all Divine and Humane reſpects had linked them together, he would not give place to any cloſe accuſation or ſuſpicion, whereby might grow ſudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no juſt ground. The faithleſs Perſian was very much delighted with this ſpeech, which miniſtred fair occaſion to the execution of his purpoſe. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wiſely conſidered, wiſhing him further to call to mind how many ways he could have uſed to bring them to confuſion, without peril to himſelf, eſpecially by burning the Country, through which they were to paſs, whereby they muſt needs have periſhed by meer Famine. For which cauſe he ſaid that it had been great folly, to ſeek by Perjury, odious to God and Man, the deſtruction of ſuch as were already in his hands: But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their ſafety, not only for thoſe ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleaſures that might redound to himſelf, and the King, by their aſſiſtance; but for that he might by their Friendſhip, hope to obtain what Cyrus had miſt. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and ſent him away ſo well aſſured of his good will, that he promiſed to bring all the Captains with him to the ſame place, where, in preſence of them all, Tiſſaphernes likewiſe promiſed to tell openly, which of them had by ſecret information ſought to raiſe diſſention between them. Clearchus himſelf being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tiſſaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had been to ſome common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principal Colonels were called into the Tent, the reſt ſtaying without, where they had not waited long ere a ſign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the reſidue ſlain. Forthwith certain bands of Perſian Horſe-men ſcoured the Field, killing as many Greeks as they met; and riding up to the very Camp of the Græcians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cauſe, till one, eſcaping ſorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haſt, thinking that the Enemy would forthwith have aſſailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embaſſadors of Tiſſaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, and Arieus, followed with three hundred Horſe, who called for the principal men in the Army, ſaying, That they brought a Meſſage from the King, which Arieus delivered to this effect. That Clearchus having broken his Faith, and the League made, was juſtly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Colonels, for detecting his Treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to ſurrender their Arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his Servant Cyrus. When ſome altercation had followed upon this Meſſage, Xenophon told the Embaſſadors, that if Clearchus had in ſuch ſort offended, it was well that he was in ſuch ſort puniſhed: but he willed them to ſend back Menon and Proxenus, whom they had ſo greatly honoured, that by them, as by common Friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be adviſed how to anſwer the Perſian. Hereunto the Embaſſadors knew not how to frame any Reply, and therefore departed without ſpeaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other four were ſent to Artaxerxes, by whoſe commandment their Heads were ſtricken off. I hold it not amiſs to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiouſneſs of Tiſſaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He ſaw his Province waſted by the Greeks, againſt whom, receiving from his Maſter convenient aid of Men and Money, he did ſo ill manage his Affairs, that neither Subtilty nor Perjury (to which he failed not to have recourſe) availing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning Head, and ſent a new Lieutenant into thoſe parts, who took it from his Shoulders. Such was the recompence of his Treachery, which made him ſo miſtruſted at Home, that the Service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and ſo hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the ſtroke, all the World being ſhut againſt him. But now let us return to the Proſperity, wherein he triumphed without great cauſe, having betrayed braver men than himſelf, and intending to bring the like miſchief upon the whole Army.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in deſpight of Tiſſaphernes went off ſafely.

GReat was the heavineſs of the Souldiers, being now deſtitute of Leaders, and no leſs their fear of the evil hanging over their Heads, which they knew not how to avoid. Among the reſt, Xenophon, whoſe Learning ſupplied his want of Experience, finding the deep ſadneſs of the whole Army to be ſuch, as hindred them from taking any courſe of preventing the danger at hand, began to adviſe the under-Officers of Proxenus his Companies, whoſe familiar Friend he had been, to bethink themſelves of ſome mean, whereby their ſafety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged; ſetting before their Eyes whatſoever might ſerve to give them hope, and above all, perſwading them in no wiſe to yield to the mercy of their Barbarous Enemies.

Hereupon they deſired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and ſo together with him, the ſame Night calling up ſuch as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fitteſt men to ſucceed in the places of thoſe who were ſlain, or taken. This being done, and order ſet down for diſburthening the Army of all ſuperfluous impediments, they eaſily comforted themſelves for the loſs of Tiſſaphernes his aſſiſtance, hoping to take Victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to ſell them: To which purpoſe they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among ſome plentiful Villages, and ſo to proceed, marching towards the heads of thoſe great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to paſs them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tiſſaphernes, whom they, ſerving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Perſian Archers, who ſhot at a farther diſtance than the Greeks could reach. For this cauſe did Xenophon provide Slings, wherewith he over-reached the Enemy; and finding ing ſome Horſes fit for ſervice, that were employed among the Carriages, he ſet men upon them; training likewiſe his Archers, to ſhoot compaſs, who had been accuſtomed to the point-blank. By theſe means did he bear off the Perſians who aſſailed him; and ſometimes gave them chaſe with that band of fifty Horſe, which being well back'd, with a firm body of Foot-men, and ſeconded with Troups of the light-armed-ſhot and ſlingers, compelled the Enemy to lie a-loof. Tiſſaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with theſe reſolute men, did poſſeſs the tops of Mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to paſs. But finally, when their Valour made way through all ſuch difficulties, he betook himſelf to that courſe, which was indeed the ſureſt, of burning the Country. With great ſorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of Victuals cut off. Some adviſed to defend the Country, as granted by the Enemy himſelf to be theirs; others to make more fires, if ſo perhaps the Perſians might be aſhamed to do that which were the deſire of ſuch as made paſſage in hoſtile manner; but theſe were faint comforts. The beſt counſel was, That being near unto the Carduchi, a People Enemy to the Perſian, they ſhould enter into their Country, paſſing over ſome high Mountains which lay between them. This courſe they followed, which could not have availed them if Tiſſaphernes had begun ſooner to cut off their Victuals, rather than to ſeek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in paſſing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of ways, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accuſtomed by force to defend themſelves againſt the huge Armies of the Perſian, were no way inferiour to the Greeks in daring, but only in the Art of War. They were very light of foot, ſkilful Archers, and uſed the Sling well; which Weapons in that Mountainous Country, were of much uſe againſt theſe poor Travellers, afflicting them in ſeven days, which they ſpent in that paſſage, far more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territory of theſe Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites, a great River, upon which the Greeks refreſhed themſelves one day, rejoycing that they had ſo well eſcaped theſe dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove eaſie. But the next Morning they ſaw certain Troops of Horſe, that lay to forbid their paſſage. Theſe were levied by the Kings Deputies in thoſe parts; Tiſſaphernes and his Companions having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, ſo that it was not poſſible for ſuch as would enter it, to make reſiſtance againſt thoſe which kept the oppoſite banks. To increaſe theſe dangers the Carduchi following upon them, lay on the ſide of a Mountain, within leſs than a mile of the Water. But it was their good hap to diſcover a Foord, by which the greater number of them paſſing over, did eaſily chaſe away the Subjects of the Perſian; and then ſending back the moſt expedite men, gave ſuccour to the Rear-ward, againſt which the Carduchi being ſlightly Armed, could not on plain ground make reſiſtance hand to hand. Theſe Carduchi ſeem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tigris; though Ptolomy place them far more to the Eaſt upon the River of Cyrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whoſe relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth beſt in this caſe deſerve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the ſeverity of a Critick. For Ptolomy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add ſmall light to this expedition; only of this laſt, I think it the ſame which falleth into Tigris, not much above Artaſigarta, ſpringing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks, having paſſed Centrites, did arrive.

How Teribazus, Governour of Armenia, ſeeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned Peace, was diſappointed, and ſhamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good Proviſion, marched without any diſturbance about fifty or threeſcore miles to the heads of the River Tigris, and paſſing over them, travelled as far further without reſiſtance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly Water, though ſmall; but Ptolomy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Perſian, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whoſe Court may ſeem to have been a School where the Art of falſhood was taught as wiſdom. He deſired Peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they ſhould take what they pleaſed, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As ſoon as he had made this League, he levied an Army, and beſetting the Straights of certain Mountains which they were to paſs, hoped well to make ſuch benefit of their ſecurity, as might give him the commendations of being no leſs craftily diſhoneſt than Tiſſaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of ſucceſs. For a great Snow fell, which cauſed the Greeks to make many fires, and ſcatter themſelves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus alſo made many fires, and ſome of his men wandred about ſeeking relief. By the fires he was diſcovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken Priſoner, the whole Plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this Captive with them for a Guide, ſought him out; and coming upon his Camp, did ſo affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the ſhout which was raiſed by the Vaunt-currors, chaſed him away. They took his Pavilion, wherein (beſides many Slaves, that were Artificers of Voluptuouſneſs) very rich Furniture was left by the treacherous Coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went North-ward, and paſſing Euphrates, not far below the Springs thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep Snow, being followed aloof by the Enemy, who durſt not approach them, but did cut off ſuch as they found ſtragling behind. The Inhabitants of the Country, through which they marched, had their Wintering-houſes under Ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals, and of Cattel, which likewiſe did Winter in the ſame Cellars with the owners. Having refreſhed themſelves in thoſe parts, and taken ſufficient eaſe after the miſerable Journey, which had conſumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond ſlaves, and taking taking a way (besides other Horses and Cattel) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabisond, through the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, near whereunto the People called Phasiani Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were to pass, made countenance of War: but some Companies being sent by Night to seize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the Enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these People to flie, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Country the Greeks did enter were the Taochi, who conveying all their provision of Victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattel were taken; the People, to avoid Captivity, threw themselves head-long down the Rocks, the very Women throwing down first their own Children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of Cattel, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took Prisoners, and cutting off their Heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven days Journey they escaped from those continual Skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through a good Corn-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation, called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his Enemies, desiring them to waste it with Sword and Fire. After five days march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their Guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an Interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had been sold into Greece, they made a good Peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the City of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army, having now good leisure to repose themselves among their Friends the Trapezuntians, did spoil the Country thirty days together, forbearing only the Borderers upon Trabisond, at the Citizens request.

* Trabisond, a Colony of the Greeks, situate in the bottom of the Euxine Sea.

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabisond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to return home by Sea: how it came into the Territory of Sinope, and there prosecuted the same purpose to effect.

HAving now found a Haven-Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take Shipping, and change their tedious Land-journeys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus, a Lacedæmonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibius the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was his Friend, that he would provide Vessels to embarque them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such Ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Lest all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to clear the ways, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Country fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophon's request. Two Ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring Ships into the Port of Trabisond: the other took Merchants and Passengers, whose Goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staid to increase the Fleet. After long abode, when Victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the Women, Children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few Ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the [a] Mossynaci, who were divided into Factions. The stronger party, despising their Friendship, caused them to joyn with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

[a] Mossynaci, a Nation of Pontus Cappadocius.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any House. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient Lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to [c] Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redress could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer Necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a method; letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonian at once, though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it self; to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this this anſwer the Embaſſadors grew better adviſed, promiſing all friendſhip that the State of Sinope could ſhew; and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promiſed to aſſiſt them with Shipping, letting them underſtand how difficult the paſſage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which croſſed their way. This good Counſel, and the fair promiſes accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would ſpare for no coſt, to be freed from ſuch a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would paſs the reſt of the way by Sea; provided, that if there ſhould want ſuch number of Veſſels as might ſerve to Embarque every one man of them, then would they not put from the ſhoar.

[b] Cotyora, a Port-Town in the same Region.

§. XIII.

Of Diſſenſion which aroſe in the Army; and how it was Embarqued.

HItherto the danger of Enemies, and miſeries of Weather and Wants, had kept the Company in firm unity; which now began to diſſolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring Air of Greece, warming their Heads with private reſpects to their ſeveral ends and purpoſes. Whileſt they, who were ſent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope; Xenophon conſidering the ſtrength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the Coaſt whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in thoſe parts, which were ſoon like to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puiſſance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cauſe he made Sacrifice, according to the ſuperſtition of his Time and Country, divining of his Succeſs by the entrails of Beaſts. The Sooth-ſayer whom he employed, had received a great Reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give Battel in ten days: he therefore having preſerved his Money carefully, was deſirous to be ſoon at home, that he might freely enjoy his Gettings. By him the purpoſe of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diverſity of mens Opinions; ſome approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this Conſultation, were ſore afraid, leſt the Poverty of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themſelves at home, ſhould give ſucceſs to the Project. Which to prevent, they promiſed to ſupply the Army with a ſufficient Fleet, and likewiſe offered money to ſome of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Souldiers Pay, if they would preſently ſet ſail for Greece. One of theſe Captains being a baniſhed man, deſired them to follow him into Troas; an other offered to lead them into Cherroneſus. Xenophon who deſired only the common Good, was pleaſed greatly with theſe propoſitions, and profeſſed openly that he would have them to ſet forward, and hold together in any caſe, puniſhing him as a Traitor that ſhould forſake the Army, before ſuch time as they were arrived at their Journeys end. Silanus the Sooth-ſayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpoſe, was hereby ſtayed from outrunning his Fellows, and driven to abide with his Wealth among poor men, longer than ſtood with his good liking. Alſo the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived that Ships were prepared ſufficient for their Navigation, but that the Money promiſed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the People of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Army was now reſolved for the Voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perſwaded them to this reſolution, thought it the wiſeſt way to furniſh them with a Navy whileſt they were in good readineſs to depart, but to keep the money to themſelves. The Captains therefore who being diſappointed by theſe Towns, found themſelves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their haſty offers, and ſignifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make propoſition to the Army, of taking the Ships, and ſailing to Phaſis, where they might ſeize upon Lands, and plant themſelves in ſuch wiſe as ſhould ſtand beſt with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buſineſs, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reſt. Theſe news becoming publick, bred a ſuſpicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the reſt of the Captains to his purpoſe, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore aſſembling the Companies, he gave them ſatisfaction, and withal complained of ſome diſorders, which he cauſed them to redreſs. A general Inquiſition was likewiſe made of offences committed ſince the death of Cyrus; which being puniſhed, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embaſſadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who ſending Preſents deſired peace of the Greeks: the Embaſſadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been ſought, for that the Greeks having now their Fleet in a readineſs, did ſoon weigh Anchors, and ſet ſail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whether Cheriſophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promiſed to give the Army Pay as ſoon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great Diſſention and Diſtraction of the Army. How the Mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and reſcued by Xenophon.

THe nearer they approached to Greece, the greater was their deſire to make proviſion for themſelves, that they might not return home empty handed. Wherefore truſting well that if the charge of the Army were abſolutely commited to one ſufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon ſole Commander of all; in whoſe favour, as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earneſt and violent. But he, either fearing to diſpleaſe the Lacedæmonians, who were jealous of him already (being incenſed by that Fugitive who forſook the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two Ships) or moved by ſome tokens appearing to him in the entrails, that threatned ill ſucceſs to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this Honour was laid upon Cheriſophus a Lacedæmonian. It ſeems that Xenophon, conſidering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting Pay, did wiſely in yielding to ſuch Tokens as forbad him to accept it: eſpecially, knowing ſo well their deſire, which was, by right or by wrong to get Wealth whereſoever it might be found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cheriſo- phus had been General but six or seven days when he was deposed, for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent Presents to the Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending Ships for their transportation. Two days they had sailed by the Coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their Journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their Provision would be spent in three days, and that being now come out of the Enemies Country, Victuals, and other necessaries could not be had without Money; for which cause he gave advice to send Messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their Wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of Money, called Cyzicens, which sum amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the Action as dishoneſt. Lest therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his Disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent, who in such wise delivered their insolent Message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their Request, brought what they could out of the Fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achæans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captains, sailed unto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid way between Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom, one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand Foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty Horse, which small Band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such Shipping as they had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the Mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take Spoils in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea: in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered, and so was that part of the Country surprised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the Sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks loaden with Booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the Hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians and Achæans: who wanting the assistance of Horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meerly upon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many Wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave Parly. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but Pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such People, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the Inland Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for Guides, them who gave him the Intelligence. His Horse-men he sent before to discover and to scour the ways; the light armed foot-men took the hill tops on either hand; all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible, whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a slight Flame, to the great terrour of the Enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his Fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The Enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given Battel, found that his advice to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by signs, that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which Journey he overtook them. They embraced Him, and His with great joy, confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the Enemies did, looking that he should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastned away to overtake him, and joyn with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disjoyn the Army, should suffer Death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of Service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persian.

THe Haven of Calpas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very ſtrong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was alſo Timber for Building and Shipping, and a very convenient Seat for a great City. All which Commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to ſtay there, and to plant, cauſed them to haſte away, fearing leſt Xenophon ſhould find ſome device to have ſetled himſelf and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home, neither did they ſo much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the Love which they bare unto him: the poorer ſort were ſuch as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (though failing of the Riches which they had hoped to purchaſe) they were now deſirous to return. But whether it were ſo that Xenophon found advantage by their own ſuperſtition, to make them ſtay, which they greatly ſuſpected; or whether the ſigns appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure: ſo long they were inforced to abide in the place till Victuals failed, neither would the Captains lead them forth to forrage the Countrey, until the Sacrifices ſhould promiſe good ſucceſs. Cheriſophus was dead of an Ague, and his Ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His Followers were joyned to the reſt of the Army, which the greater it was, the more Proviſion it needed, and the ſooner felt want. For which cauſe, he that was choſen Coronel into the place of Cheriſophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the ſpoil of ſome Villages that ſtood near at hand; in which Enterpriſe he found ill ſucceſs, the whole Country lying in wait to entrap him, and an Army of Horſe being ſent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the aſſiſtance of theſe Bythinian Thracians, which Troops falling upon the Greeks that were ſcattered abroad in ſeeking Booty, ſlew five hundred of them, and chaſed the reſt to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this Overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the reſcue of thoſe that ſurvived, and brought them ſafe to the Camp, upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, ſlew ſome, purſuing the reſt to the very Tents. This new courage of the Enemy, together with the preſent condition of the Army, ſo diſheartned and unfurniſhed of neceſſaries, cauſed the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more ſtrength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of ſuch as were leaſt able to endure travail, Xenophon with the firmeſt and beſt able men went forth, both to bury thoſe which were lately ſlain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Aſſiſtants. In this Journey his Demeanour was very Honourable. For having given Burial to the Dead, the Enemy was diſcovered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithſtanding that the Way was very rough and troubleſome, ſo that ſome thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a Wood ſcarce paſſable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the Enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, he would not fail with the greater reſolution to purſue them; from whom, if they could ſafely retire to the Camp, yet what ſhould they do there, wanting Victuals to ſuſtain them in the place, and Ships to carry them away? wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their Dinners, than another day faſting; and not to regard the uneaſie return, which might ſerve to ſtay Cowards from running away, but to wiſh unto the Enemy a fair and eaſie Way, by which he might fly from them. Theſe perſwaſions were followed with ſo valiant execution, that both Perſians and Bythinians being chaſed out of the Field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not ſuddenly be conveyed away to the diſcretion of the Greeks, who at good leiſure gathered the Harveſt of theſe bad Neighbours Fields. This was the laſt Fight which they had on the ſide of Aſia. For they were not only ſuffered quietly to enjoy the Spoil of the Country, but when the Opinion grew common in thoſe parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embaſſadours were ſent from the Neighbour People, to deſire Friendſhip, and make offer of their beſt aſſiſtance. But the Souldiers had no mind to ſtay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great Booty, which they carried away to Chryſopolis, a City near unto Chalcedon, where they ſold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, leſt their long ſtay in that Country might breed in them a deſire to viſit his Province, where they might have found great Wealth, and little Power to guard it. Therefore he ſent to the Lacedæmonian Admiral, entreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waft them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admiral condeſcending, promiſed to give the Souldiers Pay, as ſoon as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Aſia at the entreaty of the Perſian, who in the height of his Pride, had thought them ſo ſurely impriſoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Arms into his hands, and ſo to yield their Lives to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they ſeized upon Bizantium, which by Xenophons perſwaſion they forbare to ſack, I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertain little to the general courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all Ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcover the ſecrets of Aſia, and ſtir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterpriſes than ever their Forefathers had undertaken. Likewiſe it was the only remarkable Action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling inſolently, but without diſturbance. True it is, that the ſeeds of the War ſhortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already ſown, before theſe Companies returned out of the high Countries of Aſia. For the Towns of Ionia, which had ſided with young Cyrus againſt Tiſſaphernes, if not againſt the great King, prepared to rebel, which they thought ſafer than to fall into the hands of Tiſſaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians beſought the Lacedæmonians to ſend them aid, whereby to recover recover their Liberty; and obtained their requeſt.

For a power was ſent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who beſtowed his men in ſuch Towns as had already revolted, to ſecure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offenſive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whileſt they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophon's Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT ſeems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour ſhewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War againſt him, thinking it ſufficient to take all care that no advantage might ſlip, which could ſerve to ſtrengthen their Eſtate, by finding the Perſian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon's Army had revealed the baſeneſs of thoſe effeminate Aſiatiques, and rehearſed the many Victories which they themſelves had gotten, upon terms of extreme diſadvantage; then was all Greece filled with deſire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Suſa, whereof one handful had opened the paſſage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them reſiſtance, in all that long Journey of four and thirty thouſand two hundred and fifty five Furlongs, ſpent in going and returning, which make of Engliſh Miles about four thouſand two hundred fourſcore and one, a very painful march of one Year and three Months. Nevertheleſs the Civil diſtraction wherewith Greece was miſerably torn, and eſpecially that hot fire of the Theban War, which, kindled with Perſian Gold, brake forth ſuddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Aſia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Eſtate; leaving it queſtionable whether Ageſilaus, having both the ſame, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole ſpace of two Years, which he ſpent in Aſia, his deeds procured more commendation of Magnanimity and fair Behaviour, than of ſtout Courage, and great, or profitable Atchievements. For how highly ſoever it pleaſed Xenophon, who was his Friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his vertue; his exploits being only a few incurſions into the Countries lying near the Sea, carry no proportion to Xenophon's own Journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Conon the Briton with ſix thouſand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in deſpight of the Emperour Theodoſius, being rather like it than equal. But of Ageſilaus, and his Wars in Aſia and Greece, we ſhall ſpeak more in due place.

§. II.

The proſperous beginnings of the War in Aſia.

Thimbro receiving Xenophon's men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all ſuch as were willing to revolt from the Perſian, who were many, and ſome of them ſuch, as had been highly beholding to the King; who ſeem to have had no other cauſe of diſcontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tiſſaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Maſter did love him. The managing of the War begun by Thimbro, was for his Oppreſſions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himſelf as a good Man of War, and a wiſe Commander. For whereas the Rule of the Low-Countries of Aſia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tiſſaphernes, who did ill agree; Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief Command in thoſe Wars againſt the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tiſſaphernes was of a miſchievous Nature, and would not be ſorry to ſee his Corrival throughly beaten, though to the Kings loſs) made an appointment with Tiſſaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the Juriſdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province, in few days, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the ſame time ſuffered a violent alteration, which gave eaſie ſucceſs to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis, a Dardanian, had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in thoſe parts; after whoſe death, his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein ſhe behaved her ſelf ſo well, that ſhe not only was beloved of the People under her Government, but enlarged her Territory, by the Conqueſt of certain Towns adjoyning; and ſundry times gave aſſiſtance to Pharnabazus in his Wars againſt the Myſians and Piſidians. For ſhe had in pay ſome Companies of Greeks, whoſe Valour by her good uſage did her great ſervice. But ſomewhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in thoſe parts, a Son-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom ſhe truſted and loved much, being blinded with Ambition, found means to ſtifle her, and kill her Son of ſeventeen years old; which done, he ſeized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her Treaſure lay, hoping to have been admitted into poſſeſſion of her whole Eſtate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garriſon, he ſent Meſſengers with Preſents to Pharnabazus, bazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His Presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul Treason threatned; whereby the wicked Villain was driven into terms of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One only Town stood out four days (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of Liberty) the Governour striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traytor held, who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which he issued out of Scepsis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to joyn with the Greeks upon such Conditions, as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other Condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to strive against the Army, and the Townsmen, who were all of one mind, he quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a Sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly entreating that he might be suffered to retain Gergethe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise do a Sacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor, not daring to make denial, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensigns. This done, all the Goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was Enemy to the Greeks: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his detested Head. Dercyllidas, having in eight days taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates, to Winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of War. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the Truce being re-continued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth, by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with Provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the War into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneasie to recover all the Towns of Ionia: Pharax, the Admiral of the Fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to joyn with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus having respect to the Kings Service, came to assist his private Enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keep the War from their own doors, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Mæander, and not looking to have been so soon encountred, marched carelesly through the Country; when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercinary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to present Battel. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readiness, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greek very few and feeble, being to fight in an open Plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their Honour, prepared to endure the fight; which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsel of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiving the opportunity of so great a Victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a Coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave Parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, that all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own Liberty and Laws; but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procraftination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryal of a Battel.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympian Games, had set a Fine upon the City of Sparta; for non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the Solemnity, and publickly whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for presuming to contend against their Decree. Likewise they hindred Agis, King of Sparta, from doing Sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory Message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usual pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars; though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused after-afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vaſſals to themſelves. In their late Wars with Athens, the ſtrong oppoſition which they found cauſed this goodly Title of Liberty to work very ſlowly: but having now to do with a State of great ſpirit and ſmall force, it gave preſent ſucceſs to their deſires. Two years together they ſent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the firſt year an Earthquake (held in thoſe times a prodigious ſign, and which did always forbid the proſecution of any enterpriſe in hand) cauſed them to retire: the ſecond year, all the Towns of the Eleans did haſtily revolt, and the City it ſelf was driven to ſubmiſſion; conſenting both to ſuffer their old ſubjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Preſidentſhip of the Olympian Games was left unto them; which, it was not to be doubted that they would, in time coming, uſe modeſtly, finding themſelves to ſtand at the mercy of Sparta. In this Expedition all the Greeks were aſſiſtant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bœotians, whoſe aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponneſian War, as the force of Sparta it ſelf, they could not ſmother their diſlike of their unequal diviſion following the Victory; which gave to Sparta the Command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, only ſecurity againſt Athens; but ſuch a ſecurity as was worſe than the danger. For when the equal greatneſs of two mighty Eſtates did counterpoiſe each the other, it was in the power of theſe Neutral Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required: but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred proſecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of Power and Friends, the other mightily increaſed in both, it was then (if not neceſſary to obey the greatneſs which themſelves had made, yet) fooliſh and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheleſs, it was not the purpoſe of the Spartans to take occaſion of any Quarrel, which they could not finiſh at pleaſure, till ſuch time as they had by Victory or Compoſition made ſome good end with the Perſian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

The paſſage of Ageſilaus into Aſia. His War with Tiſſaphernes. How Tiſſaphernes was put to death, and the War diverted into another Province, through perſwaſion and gifts of Tithrauſtes his Succeſſor. How careleſs the Perſian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGeſilaus newly made King of Sparta, was deſirous to have the honour of the Victory, which, not without cauſe, he expected upon thoſe of Aſia; and therefore procuring a great Army to joyn with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great Pomp to Aulis in Bœotia, a Haven, lying oppoſite to the Iſland of Eubœa, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War againſt Troy, many Ages before) had embarqued his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant alſo to do Sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit; but ſaying, that the performance of ſuch Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were ſo unable to conceal their malice, that ſending ſome Companies of Horſe, they threw down his Sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Ageſilaus to entangle himſelf and his Country in any new War; therefore, waiting better opportunity of Revenge, he quietly ſwallowed the contumely, and followed his main intendment. Having landed his men at Epheſus, he was entertained by Tiſſaphernes with a Treaty of Peace, wherein Ageſilaus peremptorily requiring that the Perſian ſhould reſtore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Aſia, was promiſed that the King, being firſt informed of his demand, ſhould ſend anſwer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made; which Tiſſaphernes had ſought only to win time of making proviſion for the War, and getting ſupply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whileſt Ageſilaus was buſie in ſettling the Eſtates of his Confederate Cities on that ſide of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from War was at the coming down of theſe Forces which Artaxerxes had ſent; at what time Ageſilaus received a plain Meſſage from Tiſſaphernes, that either he muſt forthwith depart out of Aſia, or make good his aboad by ſtrong hand. Ageſilaus returning word that he was glad to hear that his Enemies had by Perjury deſerved vengeance from Heaven, prepared to invade them; and ſending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they ſhould provide Victuals, and other Neceſſaries for his Army, did eaſily make Tiſſaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tiſſaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horſe, in which part of his Forces the Perſian had moſt confidence. Therefore Tiſſaphernes beſtowing all his Companies of Foot in Caria, entred with his Horſe into the Plains of Mæander, hoping thereby to ſtop the paſſage of a heavy foot-Army, not ſuffering them to paſs into that Country which was fitteſt for their Service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great ſpoil without reſiſtance, till ſuch time as the Horſe-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a ſmall Skirmiſh having the better of the Greeks, were the occaſion that Ageſilaus returned to Epheſus. Although in this laſt Fight only twelve men were loſt, yet Ageſilaus perceiving by that tryal how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the maſtery of the Field, without a greater ſtrength of Horſe, took all poſſible care to increaſe that part of his Forces. By which means having enabled himſelf, whileſt Winter laſted, he entred upon the Country of Tiſſaphernes, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horſe-men of Tiſſaphernes in the Plain of Mæander, without aſſiſtance of their Infantry, he gave them Battel, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great Riches. The blame of this loſs fell heavy upon Tiſſaphernes, who either upon Cowardiſe had abſented himſelf from the Battel, or following ſome other buſineſs, was then at Sardes. For which cauſe his Maſter having him in diſtruſt, and thinking that Peace might be the ſooner had, which he much deſired, if the man, ſo odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he ſent into thoſe parts Tithrauſtes a Perſian, to cut off the Head of Tiſſaphernes, and ſucceed him in the Government. Such was the end of this baſe and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by Perjury he could advance his purpoſes on Earth, failed at the laſt through too much over-weening of his own Wiſdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himſelf moſt perfect. For ſuppoſing, that by his great skill in ſubtil Negotiation he ſhould one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Aſia; he did not ſeek to finiſh the War, and, according to his Maſters wiſh, bring all all things ſpeedily to quiet; but rather to temporiſe, till he might find ſome opportunity of making ſuch end as beſt might ſtand with the Kings Honour and his own. Wherein it ſeems that he much miſtook his Princes Diſpoſition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found ſuch means whereby the danger it ſelf might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whileſt by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain Peace. And this appeared well by the courſe which Tithrauſtes took at his firſt poſſeſſion of the Low-Countries. For he ſent Embaſſadors to Ageſilaus, in very friendly ſort, letting him know, that the Man who had been Author of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleaſure to let the Greeks enjoy their own Laws and Liberty, upon condition, that they ſhould pay him the Tribute accuſtomed, and the Army be forthwith diſmiſſed. The anſwer to this Propoſition, was by Ageſilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean ſeaſon he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the requeſt of Tithrauſtes, who bought his Departure with thirty Talents.

This was a ſtrange manner of War, both on the Offenſive and on the Defenſive part. For Ageſilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquiſhing the great King, was contented to forbear his ſeveral Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and thoſe Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Eſtates againſt all Enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their Heads might eaſily be taken from their Shoulders) were little offended at any Loſs that fell on their next Neighbour-Provinces, which were ſubject likewiſe to the ſame Crown of Perſia, ſo long as their own Government could be preſerved free from waſte and danger. The cauſe of this diſorder on the Perſian ſide, I can aſcribe to nothing ſo deſervedly, as to the corrupted Eſtate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and Miniſters of pleaſure, were able by partial Conſtruction to countenance or diſgrace the actions of ſuch as had the managing of things abroad; and to that fooliſh manner of the Kings (which was ſo uſual that it might be called a Rule) to reward or puniſh the Provincial Governour, according to the Benefit or Loſs, which the Country given in charge unto each of them received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to paſs, that as every one was deſirous to make his own Territory yield a large Increaſe to the Kings Treaſure; ſo no man was careful to aſſiſt his Borderers, if loſs or danger might thereby grow to himſelf and his; but ſate ſtill as an idle Beholder, when perhaps by joyning their Forces, it had not been uneaſie to recompence the ſpoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miſeries.

§. V.

The War and Treaty between Ageſilaus and Pharnabazus.

Ageſilaus having thus compounded with Tithrauſtes, entred Phrygia, burning and waſting the Country without reſiſtance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of his Camp. Theſe actions, together with his honourable Behaviour, which added much to their Luſtre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of ſtrength, which might have encreaſed his Power, and given aſſurance to the reſt of his Proceedings: but purchaſed Fame and high Reputation, by which he drew unto him ſome that were diſcontented and ſtood upon bad terms with the great King, whom he loſt again as eaſily, by means of ſome ſlight Injury done to them by his under Captains. Pharnabazus did not encloſe himſelf in any Town for fear of being beſieged, but kept the Field, lying as near as he could ſafely to the Enemies, with whom it was not his purpoſe to fight, but to make ſome good end by compoſition, which he found not uneaſie to do. For the pleaſures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their moſt neceſſity, had been ſo great, that when he (obtaining Parly) did ſet before their eyes his Bounty towards them, and his Love (which had been ſuch, that beſides many other hazards of his Perſon, he had for the reſcue of their Fleet, when it was driven to run aſhore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Sea as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horſeback againſt the Athenians) together with his Faith, which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuſe their Ingratitude, otherwiſe than by telling him, That having War with his Maſter, they were inforced, againſt their Will, to offend him. Ageſilaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him againſt the Perſian, and eſtabliſh him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Maſter did put him in truſt to make War againſt them, he would not fail to do the beſt that he could as their Enemy; if the Charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then ſhift ſide, and betake himſelf to their Alliance. The Iſſue of this Parly was, That the Army ſhould no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whileſt employment could be found elſewhere. The excuſe made by Ageſilaus, and the withdrawing of his Forces out of thoſe parts, were not ſufficient to appeaſe Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more neceſſary buſineſs elſewhere; but becauſe his Country would yield great Booty; and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulneſs with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great Commotions raiſed in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with Gold from the Perſian.

IN the mean while Tithrauſtes perceiving that Ageſilaus meant nothing leſs than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes reſt quietly in Aſia, took a wiſe courſe, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of ſubverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late Victories, and ſaw her Dominion reſtrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He ſent into Greece fifty Talents of Silver, to be imployed in raiſing War againſt the Lacedæmonians; which Treaſure, was by the ſubtil practice of him that was put in truſt with it, in ſuch wiſe wiſe diſperſed, among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all thoſe Eſtates having formerly born ſecret hate to that of Sparta, were now deſirous of nothing ſo much as of open War. And leſt this great heat of the incenſed Multitude, ſhould, for want of preſent exerciſe, begin to faint, and vaniſh away in idle words, occaſion was found out to thruſt the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themſelves might ſeem Authors of the Quarrel. Some Land there was in the Tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians, either having the better Title, or finding the greater Favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly Money for it. This Money the Locrians were either hired or perſwaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning ſo to loſe their Rent, made a diſtreſs by ſtrong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which they Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an Invaſion made upon Phocis, waſting that Countrey in the manner of open War. Such were the beginnings of profeſſed Hoſtility between Thebes and Sparta, and the firſt breaking out of their cloſe Enmity, that had long time, though hardly been concealed. For when the Phocian Embaſſadors came to Sparta, complaining of the Violence done by the Thebans, and requeſting ſuccour, they had very favourable Audience, and ready conſent to their Suit; it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to defer the acknowledgment of Injuries received, until occaſion of revenge were offered, and then to diſcover their Indignation in cold Blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own Wills, having no other War to diſturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Aſia no news, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they ſent Lyſander to raiſe all the Countries about Phocis, and with ſuch Forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Pauſanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath been ſhewed before, had two Kings) who ſhould follow him with the ſtrength of Peloponneſus. Lyſander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in thoſe parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pauſanias likewiſe raiſed all Peloponneſus, except the Corinthians (who refuſed to aſſiſt him in that Enterpriſe) meaning to joyn with Lyſander, and make a ſpeedy end of the War. The conſideration of ſo great a danger approaching ſo ſwiftly, cauſed the Thebans to ſeek what help they could abroad, foraſmuch as their own ſtrength was far too little to make reſiſtance againſt ſuch mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwiſe affected in heart than they durſt utter in Countenance; but the good Wiſhes of ſuch people were little available, conſidering that the moſt which could be expected from them, was, that they ſhould do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiverſation, the Corinthians did at that preſent caſt themſelves into the diſpleaſure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the ſafeſt courſe to procure the aſſiſtance of ſome Eſtate that might preſently declare it ſelf on their ſide, which would cauſe many others to follow the example, and make their Party ſtrong. To this end they ſent Embaſſadors to Athens, excuſing old offences, as either not committed by publick allowance, or done in time of the general War, and recompenced with Friendſhip lately ſhewn in their refuſal of aſſiſting Pauſanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants, againſt the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honours ſake, they requeſted them of aid in the preſent War, offering to do the beſt that they could for the reſtoring of Athens to her former Eſtate and Dignity. Thraſybulus and his Friends, who perſecuted by the Thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requital of the courteſie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens ſhould not only refuſe to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it ſhould aſſiſt the Thebans, and engage it ſelf in their Cauſe. Whileſt Pauſanias lay ſtill, waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lyſander being deſirous to do ſomewhat that might advance the buſineſs in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pauſanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was ſlain in Fight by the Thebans, who came haſtily to the reſcue. As this Victory did encourage the Thebans, ſo the coming of Pauſanias with his great Army did again amaze them, with preſentation of extream danger; but their ſpirits were ſoon revived by the ſtrong ſuccour which was brought from Athens, in conſideration of which, and of the late Battel, Pauſanias durſt not hazard a new Fight with them, but receiving the Bodies of thoſe that were ſlain, by compoſition, departed out of their Territory, for which, either Cowardiſe or Indiſcretion, he was at his return to Sparta, condemned as a Traitor, and driven to fly into Tegea, where he ended his days in baniſhment..

How Ageſilaus was called out of Aſia to help his Countrey. A Victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, aſſiſted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedemonian Fleet; recovers the Maſtery of the Seas; and rebuilds the Walls of Athens.

THis good Succeſs, and the Confederacy made with Athens, gave ſuch reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith ſide with them, and raiſing a ſtrong Army, determined to give Battel to the Lacedæmonians, as near as they might to their own doors; conſidering that the Force of Sparta it ſelf was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magiſtrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, ſent for Ageſilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promiſing his Friends in Aſia to return ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance, paſſed the Straights of Helleſpont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new League had given Battel to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Aſſociates, but with ill ſucceſs. For when the right Wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the Chaſe in ſome diſorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left Wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the Victory of that day entirely their own. The report of this Battel meeting Ageſilaus at Amphipolis, were by him ſent over into Aſia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his Friend, who had ſince his departure ſeen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lyſander the Admiral ſlain. The ſame man, whoſe endeavour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with Money, and all manner of Supplies, was now the occaſion that the power of Athens grew ſtrong at Sea, when the City was deſpoiled of her old reputation, and ſcarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her own defence. Pharnabazus conſidering how much it imported the King his Maſter, to have the Greeks divided into ſuch Factions, as might utterly diſable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the ſafeſt way for himſelf, during theſe broils, to take ſuch order, that he ſhould not need any more, to ſeek Peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked had ſold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpoſe he furniſhed Conon the Athenian with eight Ships, who had eſcaped, when the Fleet of Athens was ſurprized by Lyſander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the loſs received at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like deſtruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this Victory Conon ſailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his Victory, ſo ſtrong a Navy, and ſo much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to re-build their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signory which they had loſt.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry ſmall Victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians loſe all in Aſia: The Athenians recover ſome part of their old Dominion.

NEvertheleſs the Lacedæmonians, by many Victories at Land, maintained for ſome years the honour of their Eſtate, endangered very greatly by this loſs at Sea. For Ageſilaus obtained the better with his Horſe-men, from the Theſſalians, who were accounted the beſt riders in Greece: He waſted Bœotia, and fought a great Battel at Coronea againſt the Thebans, and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marſhal Gylis forraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of theſe Victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many loſſes, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the Battels of Coronea vanquiſh the Orchomenians, who ſtood oppoſite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Ageſilaus charged them in their return from the purſuit. Likewiſe Gylis was ſlain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and ſome other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed againſt the Corinthians, were repayed with equal damage received in the parts adjoyning; many Towns being eaſily taken, and as eaſily recovered. The variety of which inter-feats was ſuch, that the Thebans themſelves were drawn, by the loſs of the Haven of Corinth, to ſue for Peace, but could not get Audience, till ſuch time as the news came of a great Victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian Forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embaſſadors being ſent for, and willed to do their Meſſage, required only in ſcorn, to have a ſafe Conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incurſions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt moſt loſs; their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary ſide, until Ageſilaus repayed theſe invaders with equal, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did ſo afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driven to ſue for Peace. But the affairs at Sea were of moſt conſequence, upon which the ſucceſs of all depended. For when the Towns of Aſia perceived, that the Lacedæmonians were not only entangled in an hard War at home, but almoſt diſabled to paſs the Seas, having loſt their Fleet at Cnidus; they ſoon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promiſed to allow that they ſhould uſe their own Laws, if they would expel the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydos did ſtand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his beſt to contain all the Towns about Helleſpont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, becauſe the Athenian Fleet under Thraſybulus took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Iſle of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

The baſe Conditions offered unto the Perſian by the Lacedæmonians. Of ſundry Fights and other paſſages in the War. The Peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceive, how uneaſie a thing it would be, to maintain the War againſt men as good as themſelves, aſſiſted with the Treaſures of Perſia; wherefore they craved Peace of Artaxerxes, moſt baſely offering, not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Aſia, and to leave them to the Kings diſpoſition; but withal to ſet the Iſlanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and abſolute liberty, whereby they ſaid that all the principal Eſtates of their Country would ſo be weakened, that no one, nor all of them ſhould be able to ſtir againſt the great King. And ſure it was, that the power of the Country being ſo broken, and rent into many ſmall pieces, could neither have diſquieted the Perſian, by an offenſive War, nor have made any good defence againſt him, but would have left it eaſie for him in continuance of time, to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himſelf Maſter of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were ſo carried with Envy, that perceiving how the Dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they choſe rather to give all from themſelves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation ſhould grow ſtronger than themſelves, who ſo lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the firſt accepted, both in regard that the other Eſtates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joyned together againſt the Lacedæmonians, did by their ſeveral Embaſſadors oppoſe themſelves unto it; and for that it was thought ſafeſt for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interpoſing himſelf to bring Friends and Foes on the ſudden to an equality. Eſpecially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes did ſend as his Lieutenant into the Low-Countries, did ſeek to repay the harm done by Ageſilaus in thoſe parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the Peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was ſent into Aſia to make War upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War, being ſcattered about, all the Iſles and Towns on the firm Land grew almoſt to the manner of Piracy and Robbery, affording many Skirmiſhes, but few great Actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was ſlain by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was ſent, who demeaned himſelf more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, becauſe he had not impeached Thraſybulus in his enterenterpriſes about Helleſpont; Anaxibius, who ſucceeded him, was ſurpriſed and ſlain in a skirmiſh by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thraſybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was ſlain by the way at Aſpendus; the City of Rhodes having long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Ariſtocraty, or the Government of a few the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwiſe, the Athenians were accuſtomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the People, each of them ſeeking to aſſure themſelves, by erecting in the Towns of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more eſpecial cauſe did not hinder) cauſed the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The People of Ægina roved upon the Coaſt of Attica, which cauſed the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and beſiege their Town; but this Siege being raiſed by the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Iſlanders began anew to moleſt Attica, which cauſed the Athenians to man their Ships again, that returned beaten, having loſt four of thirteen. The loſs of theſe Ships was ſoon recompenſed by a Victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina; whereupon the Iſlanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well ſeem ſtrange that the City of Athens, having but newly raiſed her Walls, having not by any fortunate and important Battel ſecured her Eſtate from dangers by Land; but only depending upon the aſſiſtance of ſuch Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had often diſcovered themſelves irreſolute in the common cauſe, would ſend a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the maſtery of the Seas was ſo ill aſſured, that an Iſland lying in the Eye of Piræus, had ability to vex the Coaſt of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cauſe it uſually to embrace more than it could compaſs; ſo the inſolency and ſhameleſs injuſtice of the People, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a deſire to keep themſelves far out of ſight, and to ſeek employments at ſuch diſtance as might ſecure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publick judgments, out of which few or none eſcaped. For which cauſe Timotheus did paſs away much part of his time in the Iſle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace, and Chabrias did now carry away into Cyprus a greater Force than his Country well could have ſpared; with which he returned not when the buſineſs in Cyprus came to an end, but ſought new Adventures in Ægypt, whereby aroſe neither thanks to himſelf, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleſs of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, ſhortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a ſtrong hope of ſurpriſing the Navy of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking aright, that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten Ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in Harbour, whoſe Mariners were aſleep in their Cabins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he ſailed by Night unto the Mouth of the Port, which entring at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) moſt of the men on ſhore, and few or none left aboard to make reſiſtance; by which means he took many Ships laden with Merchandizes, many Fiſher-men, Paſſengers, and other Veſſels; alſo three or four Gallies, having ſunk or broken, and made unſerviceable, as many of the reſt as the time would ſuffer. About this time, Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in Marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Aſia; by whoſe aſſiſtance, the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Helleſpont; in ſuch wiſe, that perhaps they ſhould not have needed the Peace, which they themſelves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the Conditions whereof were ſuch as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Country into as many ſeveral States as there were petty Burroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own Peace with Money, did likewiſe by his Money become Arbitrator and Decider of Controverſies between the Greeks, diſpoſing of their buſineſs in ſuch wiſe as ſtood beſt with his own good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his Decree was, That all Aſia and Cyprus ſhould be his own; the Iſles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be ſubject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be ſet at liberty; and that whoſoever ſhould refuſe this Peace, upon them the approvers of it ſhould make War, the King aſſiſting them by Land and Sea, with Men, and Ships, and Treaſure. The Athenians were ſo diſcouraged by their loſſes at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the neceſſity of maintaining many Garriſons, for which they wanted Money; and other States by the miſeries of the War, whereof they ſaw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did conſent unto theſe Articles. This was called the Peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themſelves the execution, did not only compel the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garriſons, lately thruſt into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Bœotia free, of which Province Thebes had always held the Government: the Thebans themſelves being alſo comprehended under the name of Bœotians, but cauſed the Mantinæans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages; alledging that they had formerly been accuſtomed ſo to do, though purpoſing indeed to chaſtiſe them, as having been ill affected to Sparta in the late War. By theſe courſes the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the ſmall Towns in Greece would, when occaſion ſhould require it, willingly follow them in their Wars, as Authors of their Liberty; and that the great Cities having loſt all their dependants, would be unable to make oppoſition.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by Treaſon, and Olynthus by Famine.

WHileſt theſe Wars, which ended without either Victory or Profit, conſumed the Riches and Power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown ſo mighty, that ſhe did not only command her Neighbour-Towns, but was become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it ſelf. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the uſual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to ſet at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almoſt now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themſelves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neareſt unto the danger of theſe incroaching Neighbours, acquainted the La- cedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too ſtrong for all Greece, if ſome continuance of time ſhould give it reputation, which only it wanted; wherefore they requeſted aſſiſtance, but in ſuch terms as did ſound of compulſion; proteſting that either they muſt war upon Olynthus, or become ſubject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a haſty levy of men, two thouſand being preſently ſent away with promiſe to be ſeconded by a greater Army. Whileſt theſe two thouſand gave ſuch beginning to the War, as agreed with their ſmall number; the body of the Army following them ſurprized the Cittadel of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hands of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by ſome of the Magiſtrates, who ſought to ſtrengthen their Faction by the ſlavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the Peace lately made between them; which cauſed the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of Reward or of Puniſhment: In concluſion, profit ſo far over-weighed honeſty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into Baniſhment, and the Traytors rewarded with the Government of the City; by whoſe Authority, and the force of the Garriſon, the Thebans were compelled to ſerve the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This acceſs of power having ſtrengthened the Lacedæmonians, cauſed them to entertain the greater Forces about Olynthus, which (notwithſtanding the loſs of one great Battel, and ſome other diſaſters) they compelled at length by Famine to render it ſelf to their obedience.

How the Thebans recovered their Liberty, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garriſon.

AFter this Olynthian War, which endured almoſt three years, it ſeemed that no Eſtate in Greece was able to make head againſt that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found means to ſhake off their Yoke, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the baniſhed men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magiſtrates, coming to Athens, that the Tyranny wherewith his Country was oppreſſed, pleaſed him no better than it did thoſe who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a Plot was laid between theſe two, that ſoon found very good ſucceſs, being managed thus. Seven of the baniſhed men forſook Athens privily, and entred by Night into the Fields of Thebes; where ſpending the next day ſecretly, they came late in the Evening to the Gates like Husband-men returned from Work, and ſo paſſed undiſcovered unto the Houſe of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawn into the Conſpiracy. The day following, a Solemn Feaſt being then held in the City, Phyllidas promiſed the Governours, who were inſolent and luſtful men, that he would convey unto them that Night the moſt beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they ſhould take their pleaſure. Having cheared them with ſuch hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promiſe, unleſs they would diſmiſs their followers; becauſe the Gentlewomen, who attended without in a Chamber, would not endure, that any of the Servants ſhould ſee their faces. Upon this occaſion the attendants were diſmiſſed, and the Conſpirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours looſe behaviour, ſlew them all upon the ſudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their Garments. Then preſently caſting off their Diſguiſe, they went to other places, where feigning themſelves to come to the Governours upon buſineſs, they got admittance, and ſlew thoſe which were of the Lacedæmonian Faction. By the like device they brake into the Priſon, ſlew the Gaoler, and ſet at liberty ſuch as they thought meet; and being followed by theſe deſperate men, proclaimed Liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Caſtle hearing the Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be ſtronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwiſe miſtruſted, that it was a practice to diſcover ſuch, as would be forward upon occaſion of revolting. But as ſoon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the People took Arms and Beſieged the Caſtle, ſending haſtily to Athens for ſuccour. The Garriſon alſo ſent for aid unto the Towns adjoyning, whence a few broken Troups coming to the reſcue, were defeated on the way by the Horſe-men of Thebes. On the other ſide, the baniſhed Thebans did not only make ſpeed to aſſiſt their Country-men, but procured ſome Athenians to joyn with them, and thereby came ſo ſtrong into the City, that the Caſtle was yielded more through fear than any neceſſity, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Arms; for which compoſition the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the ſucceſs arrived at Sparta, an Army was raiſed forthwith, and all things prepared as earneſtly for the recovering of that City, as if ſome part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town perfidiouſly uſurped by them, reſtored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was ſent on this expedition; who having wearied his followers with a toilſome Winters Journey, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Army, at Theſpies, to infeſt the Thebans; who doing them ſome diſpleaſures, made large amends by a fooliſh attempt upon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, he waſted the Country adjoyning, and drave away Cattel, cauſing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully ſeeking how to withdraw themſelves.

Chap. XII.

Of the flouriſhing Eſtate of Thebes, from the Battel of Leuctra to the Battel of Mantinæa.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together againſt Sparta. How the Athenians made Peace for themſelves and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban Greatneſs.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great reſolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings, but one diſhonorable rule they held, That all reſpects withſtanding the Commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practiſe of which Doctrine, even by the beſt and wiſeſt of them, did greatly blemiſh that Eſtate, but when it was put in execution by inſufficient over-weening men, it ſeldom failed to bring upon them inſtead of profit unjuſtly expected, both ſhame and loſs. And ſo it befel them in their enterpriſes of Phœbidas, upon the Caſtle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For howſoever Ageſilaus did ſpoil the Country about Thebes, in which he ſpent two Sommers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good ſucceſs of ſome attempts, grew ſtronger than they were at the firſt.

The Athenians likewiſe began to look abroad, ſailing to the Iſle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleaſure, and having in ſome Fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponneſian War, to ſurround Peloponneſus with a Navy; afflicting ſo the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their inſolency wearied their Friends, and cauſed them to ſeek for Peace, it had been very likely that the courſe of this War ſhould have ſoon come to a good end, which nevertheleſs, being proſecuted by the Thebans (who oppoſed at once both theſe two great Eſtates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not ſparing ſuch as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themſelves, whileſt engaged in ſuch a War, unable to relieve their complaining Friends, reſolved to ſettle the Affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of Peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Perſian. Wherefore they ſent Meſſengers to Thebes, peremptorily ſignifying, That it was their intent to finiſh the War; to which purpoſe they willed the Thebans to ſend Embaſſadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condeſcended, fearing otherwiſe that they ſhould be left out of the Treaty of Peace, which came to paſs, being ſo wrought by the couragious Wiſdom of Epaminondas, who underſtood far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did ſoon agree; but when the Thebans offered to ſwear to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians, Ageſilaus required them to ſwear in their own Name, and to leave the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their Obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made anſwer, That the City of Sparta ſhould give example to Thebes, by ſetting the Laconians free; for that the Signory of Bœotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly ſpoken; but was heard with no patience: For Ageſilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto thoſe of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Aſia into Greece, and diſappointed of all the Glory which he had hoped to atchieve by the Perſian War, did now very paſſionately urge that Point of ſetting the Bœotians at liberty, and finding it as obſtinately refuſed, he daſht the Name of the Thebans out of the League. At the ſame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his Power, which he did, and was there ſlain at Leuctra, and with him the Flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra being one of the moſt famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not ſo notable for any Circumſtance foregoing it, or for the managing of the Fight it ſelf, as for the Death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but eſpecially, for that after this Battel (between which and the concluſion of the general Peace, there paſſed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the Strength and Reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near; whereas contrariwiſe the Thebans, whoſe greateſt Ambition had in former times confined it ſelf unto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to undertake the Leading and Command of many People and Eſtates, in ſuch wiſe, that ſoon after they brought an Army of threeſcore and ten thouſand ſtrong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the Afflictions of an hard War valiantly endured, advance the Affairs of the diſtreſſed, and guide them into the way of Conqueſt, by ſtiffening that reſolution with a manly temper, which Wealth and Eaſe had through Luxury, Rechleſſneſs, and many other Vices or Vanities, made ruſty and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New Troubles hence ariſing. Epaminondas invadeth and waſteth the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians refuſing to take advantage of this Overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did nevertheleſs finally give them to underſtand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their Pride might well be laid away. For, taking upon themſelves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Ageſilaus (perhaps of purpoſe to make benefit of Quarrels that might ariſe) had left left unperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the general Liberty of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified, under the Stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh Garboils. The Mantinæans claiming power by this Decree to order their Affairs at their own Pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, reedifie it, and ally themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with Factions; some desiring to hold good correspondence with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give Impeachment to the Mantinæans; nor take upon them to correct their Ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the Factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraign help. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the People of Tegea, against the Mantinæans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the Power of which Countreys, they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving Battel to Agesilaus. The Army of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost six hundred years were spent, since the Dorians, under the Posterity of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time, the sound of an Enemies Trumpet was not heard in that Country: Ten years were not fully past since all Greece was at the Devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty Forces of Athens, and other Enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light Fire, the very Smoak whereof the Women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignity notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at liberty as many of their Heilotes or Slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some Towns of Peloponnesus they received speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without Battel, having rebuilded the City of Messene, and peopled it anew by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans; who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate Presumption of the Arcadians.

THis Journey therefore utterly defaced the Reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the Conduct of the Army which was to be raised, nor any manner of Precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held League with it, unto Athens, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a Composition well agreeing with the situation and quality of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those Companies of Horse and Foot whereof the Land-Army was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have Command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vain Ambition was more regarded than the common Profit, which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where Consultation, Resolution, and Performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second Invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their Enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their Strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this League between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the Conduct in such manner, disable the Society, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the Enemies Heads with the like Vanity. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the Field, and having found by many tryals that their People were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in Courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the Government with their Friends the Thebans; and not always continue Followers of others, by encreasing whose Greatness, they should strengthen their own Yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of general Peace having been made (which took not effect, because the City of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their Friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying two much upon their own Worth, were overthrown in a great Battel, their Calamity being as pleasing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great Growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitless issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians Misfortune, considering, that, without their Aid, the Success of all Enterprises proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Thessalians, and Moderators of the great Quarrels that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the Differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them them best, they carried Philip the Son of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes; having therefore obtained such reputation that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of Alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassador the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose Reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especial points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their Ships of War to Sea; only the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a sure Party in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their Greatness should be on that side his own security. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown, and, having turned the Profit of their Victories upon the Persian, to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signory in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous Misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with Treasure and all sorts of Aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their own indiscretion brought them on their Knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the Conquest of Asia, from which, though by the Commotion raised in Greece with Persian Gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their Power, and setled things in Greece, it was not unlikely that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same Enterprise, had not they been empeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwise had always discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his Invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens; and finally, having offered much contumely to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to look abroad, whereunto if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good Haven Towns, which they could not seize upon without open breach of that Peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as far forth as he might without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that means he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficial to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great Rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the Affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one City might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satrapæ, or Viceroys of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia, humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the Divine Councel had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conspiracy of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm Body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed and vanished like a Mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatiques wearied quickly with the Travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common Cause, and each man striving to be the first that by Treason to his Company should both redeem the former Treason to his Prince, and purchase with all his own promotion with increase of Riches. Of this Commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idely followed, and foolishly laid down, having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole Reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus, to the Invasion of Ægypt, I find nothing (this Insurrection, and a fruitless Journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much less of digression from the course of the business in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the Pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The Troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his Wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest Enemies to her Son Cyrus, or gloried in his Death: upon whom, when by poyson and mischievous practises she had satisfied her feminine Appetite of Revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the Perswasion, which Princes not endued with an especial grace do readily entertain, That his own Will was the supreme Law of his Subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happiness Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same Felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such Foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this transitory World, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from Heaven, or made vain and unprofitable ere the Frame can be raised to full heighth, by confusion of Tongues among the Builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common Peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all Controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings Letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawn thither from all parts of Greece; when an Oath was required for observation of the form of Peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said that they were sent to hear the Articles; not to swear unto them. Hereby the the Thebans were driven to ſend unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refuſed it, ſaying, That they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, diſappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this Negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatneſs, but left them as it found them to relie upon their own Swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was divided, between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one ſide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great Tumults riſing in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did ſtand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatneſs, drawn all her followers into a cruel inteſtine War, by which the whole Country, and eſpecially the Eſtate of theſe two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyn their Forces againſt the Thebans, who ſought to make themſelves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of theſe ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received; or in diſlike of thoſe who by ſtrong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which Authority they could not ſuddenly aſpire without ſome injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men whom neceſſity had made Warlike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great ſpirits, and being ſo mighty in dependants, that ſhe had reduced all the Continent of Greece without Peloponneſus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beſide excepted) under ſuch acknowledgment, as wanted not much of meer Vaſſallage, did hope to bring all Peloponneſus to the like obedience, wherein already ſhe had ſet good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themſelves in ancient Nobility Superiours; but were far under them in Valour, having been often beaten out of the Field by them, and put in danger of loſing all; which cauſed them to ſuſpect and envy nothing more than the greatneſs and honour of Sparta; taking Truce with her when ſhe was at reſt, and had leiſure to bend her whole force againſt them; but firmly joyning with her Enemies whenſoever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, ſure Friends of Thebes, ſo the Arcadians, tranſported with a great opinion of their own Worthineſs, had formerly renounced and provoked againſt them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to ſend an Army into Peloponneſus, before ſuch time as theſe wavering Friends ſhould fall further off, and become either Neutral, or, which was to be feared, open Enemies. And ſurely great cauſe there was to ſuſpect the worſt of them, conſidering that without conſent of the Thebans, they had made Peace with Athens; which was very ſtrange, and ſeemed no leſs to the Athenians themſelves, who holding a firm League with Sparta at the ſame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheleſs accept this new Confederacy, not relinquiſhing the old, becauſe they found that, howſoever theſe Arcadians were Enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they ſhould hereby be drawn ſomewhat further from their Alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponneſus with a ſtrong Army. But this did rather haſten, than by any means ſtay, the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way ſomewhat more clear for him (becauſe the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Iſthmus, and had been adverſe to Thebes, was now, by miſeries of this grievous War, driven to become Neutral) took occaſion hereby, and by ſome diſorders among the Arcadians, to viſit Peloponneſus with an Army, conſiſting of all the power of Thebes. A great Tumult had riſen in Arcadia about conſecrated Money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uſes. In compounding the differences grown upon this occaſion, ſuch as had leaſt will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of ſome Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take Priſoners many of their Country-men, as People deſirous of innovation. This was done: but the uproar thereby cauſed was ſo great, that the Priſoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado ſcarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them who had made the Peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be ſhortly among them, to judge of their Fidelity, by the aſſiſtance which they ſhould give him in that War which he intended to make in Peloponneſus. Theſe Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of ſo mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently ſuſpect that great preparation to be made againſt themſelves. Hereupon ſuch of them as had before ſought means to ſettle the Affairs of their Country, by drawing things to ſome good concluſion of Peace, did now forthwith ſend to Athens for help; and withal diſpatched ſome of the principal among them as Embaſſadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themſelves to the common defence of Peloponneſus, now ready to be invaded. This Embaſſage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, againſt whom they well knew that all their Forces, and beſt Proviſions, would be no more than very hardly ſufficient. Forbearing therefore to diſpute about Prerogatives, they (who had been accuſtomed unto ſuch a Supremacy, as they would in no wiſe communicate with the powerful City of Athens, till other hope of ſecuring their own Eſtate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chief, ſhould be given, for the time, to that City, in whoſe Territory it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible Invaſion of Peloponneſus by Epaminondas.

CErtain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm conſent, and uniform care of the common ſafety. For beſide the great Forces raiſed out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Meſſenians, prepared with all their ſtrength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Army coming coming from Athens would paſs by Sea; whereupon he diſlodged, and came to Tegea, which City, and the moſt of all Arcadia beſides, forth-with declared themſelves his. The common opinion was, that the firſt attempt of the Thebans, would be upon ſuch of the Arcadians as had revolted; which cauſed the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortifie Mantinæa with all diligence, and to ſend for Ageſilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that ſmall force of able men, which remained in the Town, they might be ſtrong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held ſo good eſpial upon his Enemies, that had not an unknown Fellow brought haſty advertiſement of his purpoſe to Ageſilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinæa, the City of Sparta had ſuddenly been taken. For thither with all ſpeed and ſecrecy did the Thebans march, who had ſurely carried the City, notwithſtanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it; but that Ageſilaus in all flying haſt got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the reſcue as faſt as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their Friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, ſo it preſented him with a fair advantage upon Mantinæa. It was the time of Harveſt, which made it very likely that the Mantinæans, finding the War to be carried from their Walls into another quarter, would uſe the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their Corn, and turning out their Cattel into their Fields, whileſt no Enemy was near that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinæa, ſending his Horſe-men before him, to ſeize upon all that might be found without the City. The Mantinæans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were ſcattered abroad in the Country; far more intent upon their Harveſt-buſineſs, than upon the War, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelves out of diſtance. By which preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Town it ſelf in no great likelihood of holding out, when the Enemy ſhould have taken all their Proviſion of Victuals with ſo many of the People, as had not over-dearly been redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſociety with Thebes. But at the ſame time, the Athenians coming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantinæa, were very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their Goods, and People, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious Adventure to deliver thoſe who otherwiſe were given as loſt. The Thebans were known at that time to be the beſt Souldiers of all the Greeks; and the commendation of good Horſe-man-ſhip had always been given to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of Honour ſo wrought upon the Athenians, that for the Reputation of their City, which had entred into this War, upon no neceſſity of her own, but only in deſire of relieving her diſtreſſed Friends, they iſſued forth of Mantinæa, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelves, or their Horſes with meat; and giving a luſty charge upon the Enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot Fight, they remained Maſters of the Field, giving by this Victory a ſafe and eaſie retreat to all that were without the Walls. The whole power of the Bœotians arrived in the place ſoon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Aſſiſtants were not far behind.

Epaminondas, conſidering that his Commiſſion was almoſt now expired, and that his attempts of ſurprizing Sparta and Mantinæa having failed, the impreſſion of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponneſians, would ſoon vaniſh, unleſs by ſome notable act he ſhould abate their courage in their firſt growth, and leave ſome memorable Character of his Expedition; reſolved to give them Battel, whereby he reaſonably hoped both to ſettle the doubtful affections of his own Aſſociates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in ſpirit and ability as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into ſubjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, wherein Victory ſhould be rewarded with Lordſhip of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be ſuch, as promiſed the accompliſhment of his own deſire; he made ſhew of declining the Enemy, and intrenching himſelf in a place of more advantage, that ſo by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their Valour, and afterwards ſtrike their Senſes with amazement, when he ſhould come upon them unexpected. This Opinion deceived him not: For with very much tumult, as in ſo great and ſudden a danger, the Enemy ran to Arms, neceſſity enforcing their reſolution, and the conſequence of that days ſervice urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army conſiſted of thirty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe; the Lacedæmonians and their Friends were ſhort of this number, both in Horſe and in Foot, by a third part. The Mantinæans (becauſe the War was in their Country) ſtood in the right Wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians: the Athenians had the left Wing, the Achæans, Eleans, and others of leſs account, filled the body of the Army. The Thebans ſtood in the left Wing of their own Battel, oppoſite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Arcadians; the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Meſſenians, and Theſſalians with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right Wing, the Horſe-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a Troup of the Eleans were in rear. Before the foot-men could joyn, the encounter of the Horſe on both ſides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithſtanding the valiant reſiſtance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the Enemy either in courage or skill, were over-laid with numbers, and ſo beaten upon by Theſſalian ſlings, that they were driven to forſake the place, and leave their Infantry naked. But this retreat was the leſs diſgraceful, becauſe they kept themſelves together, and did not fall back upon their own foot-men; but finding the Theban Horſe to have given them over, and withal diſcovering ſome Companies of Foot, which had been ſent about by Epaminondas, to charge their Battel in the Rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean ſeaſon the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly preſſed by the Theban Horſe-men, in ſuch wiſe that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of Horſe came up to the relief of it, and reſtored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, theſe contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient Honour; ſo that equal courage and equal loſs on both ſides made the hope & appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful; unleſs perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might ſeem the more likely to prevail, as having born the firſt brunt and fury of the on-ſet, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Diſcipline, as it were by Nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practiſe of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit ſo ſure and general. But Epaminondas perceiving the obſtinate ſtiffneſs of the Enemies to be ſuch, as neither the bad ſucceſs of their own Horſe, nor all the Force of the Bœotian Army, could abate ſo far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice Company of the moſt able men, whom he caſt into the form of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure againſt a Squadron, and by his own exceeding vertue, acompanied with the great ſtrength and reſolution of them which followed him, did open their Ranks, and cleave the whole Battel in deſpight of all reſiſtance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may juſtly be ſaid to have carried the Victory, ſeeing that they remained Maſters of the ground whereon the Battel was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alledged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the ſlaughter of thoſe Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead Bodies; it was a Ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and ſerved meerly for oſtentation, ſhewing that by the Fight they had obtained ſomewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwiſe than by requeſt. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of Battel; none daring to abide them in the Field: whereof a manifeſt confeſſion is expreſſed from them, who forſake the place which they had choſen or accepted, as indifferent for tryal of their ability and proweſs. This was the laſt work of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike Troup of men, which broke the Lacedæmonian Eſquadron, and forced it to give back in diſarray, was furiouſly charged on the ſudden by a deſperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheleſs with a ſingular courage maintained the Fight, uſing againſt the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own Body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received ſo violent a ſtroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the Iron and a piece of the tronchion in his breaſt. Hereupon he ſunk down, and was ſoon conveyed out of the Fight by his Friends; having by his fall ſomewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his Body) but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavy miſchance, did with great ſlaughter compel their diſordered Enemies to leave the Field; though long they followed not the chaſe, being wearied more with the ſadneſs of this diſaſter, than with all the travel of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phyſicians, That when the head of the Dart ſhould be drawn out of his Body, he muſt needs die. Hearing this, he called for his Shield, which to have loſt was held a great diſhonour: It was brought unto him. He bad them tell him which part had the Victory; anſwer was made, that the Bœotians had won the Field. Then ſaid he, it is fair time for me to die; and withal ſent for Iolidas and Diophantes, two principal Men of War, that were both ſlain; which being told him, he adviſed the Thebans to make Peace, whileſt with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the Office of a General. Herewithal he willed that the head of the weapon ſhould be drawn out of his Body; comforting his Friends that lamented his death, and want of Iſſue, by telling them that the Victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two fair Daughters, in whom his memory ſhould live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthieſt man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Country: for he equalled all others in the ſeveral vertues, which in each of them were ſingular. His Juſtice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferiour to his Military Vertue; in every part whereof he ſo excelled, that he could not properly be called a Wary, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountiful or an Induſtrious, and a Provident Captain; all theſe Titles, and many other, being due unto him, which with his notable Diſcipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect compoſition of an Heroick General. Neither was his private Converſation unanſwerable to thoſe high parts, which gave him praiſe abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; reſolute in Publick buſineſs, but in his own particular eaſie, and of much mildneſs; a lover of his People, bearing with mens Infirmities, witty and pleaſant in ſpeech, far from inſolence, Maſter of his own Affections, and furniſhed with all qualities that might win and keep love. To theſe Graces were added great ability of Body, much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightned, reſted not in the ſweetneſs of Contemplation, but brake forth into ſuch effects as gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all People adjoyning, and the higheſt Command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Battel of Mantinæa. The Voyage of Ageſilaus into Ægypt. His death and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THis Battel of Mantinæa was the greateſt that ever had been fought in that Country between the Neutrals; and the laſt. For at Marathon and Platæa, the populous Armies of the Barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard tryal to the Græcian Valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military ſo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponneſian War, as long continuance and daily exerciſe had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, thoſe excepted which were undertaken againſt foreign Enemies, proving for the moſt part unfortunate. But in this laſt Fight all Greece was intereſſed, which never had more able Souldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the ſucceſs, or more obſtinate reſolution. All which notwithſtanding, the iſſue being ſuch as hath been related, it was found beſt for every particular Eſtate, that a general Peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed, every one retaining what he preſently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Meſſenians were by name compriſed in this new League, League, which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in Ceremonies, which had no power to declare it self in execution. This Peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seek after Wealth by foreign employment in Ægypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small Forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenary, to serve under Tachos King of Ægypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Ægypt, went now as a Voluntary, with such Forces as he could raise by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Ægyptian Kings descended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, having retained the Country notwithstanding all intestine Dissentions, and foreign Invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the Valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with Gold) they conceived great hope, not only to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domestical Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is that the Rebellion it self had soon come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proved a false Traytor, joyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country; though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the Conduct of the Army, using his service only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howsoever it came to pass, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King, to whom all, or most of the Ægyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treason to the former King Tachos, and good Service done to himself, rewarded him with two hundred and thirty Talents of Silver, with which booty sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate and valiant, and a good Leader in War; free from Covetousness, and not reproached with any blemish of Lust; which praises are the less admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief, of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust, and vain-glorious, measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses whose ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meer necessity to grow Warlike, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good Friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the balance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great Wars under sundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of Employments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other some Quarrel with every Town in Greece; had made a War in Asia, and medled in the business of the Ægyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessors: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large Wages, which Pompey never took. Herein also they are very like; each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of Liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government only being changed: But the Liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it self, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious War; yet the Signory, and ancient Renown of Sparta was presently lost: and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in this Theban War, and after much Bloud lost, ill healed by the Peace ensuing, did very soon upon the death of Agesilaus give up the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

The FOURTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip, the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THE Greeks, of whom we have already made large Diſcourſe, not as yet wearied with inteſtine War, nor made wiſe by their vain Contention for Superiority, do ſtill, as in former times, continue the Invaſion and Vaſtation of each other.

Againſt Xerxes, the greateſt Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their Liberty with as happy ſucceſs as ever Nation had, and with no leſs Honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a tryal, and experience, more than fortunate, againſt thoſe Nations they ſo little regarded what might come from them, who had ſo often forfeited the Reputation of their Forces, as whatſoever could be ſpared from their own diſtraction at home, they tranſported over the Helleſpont, as ſufficient to entertain and buſie them withal.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the World, that they under-fall and periſh by the hands and harms which they leaſt fear; ſo fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to ſpeak) they they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their own safeties, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Persian Victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the Power and Purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Græcians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their own, much less to work any Wonders against their Borderers. And indeed it was not in their Philosophy to consider, That all great alterations are storm-like, sudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decaied and broken Banks, when great Rivers are once swollen, fast running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking down those Defences which stood between them and this Inundation, than seek to rampare and re-enforce their own Fields, which by the Level of reason they might have found to have lain under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius; Græciæ Civitates dum imperare singulæ cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their Command, by striving each of them to command all. Oros. l. 3. c. 12.

The Kingdom of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the Son of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the Family of Temenus, of the Race of Hercules, and by Nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the Translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many People, and as he was marching through that Countrey, the Weather being rainy and tempestuous, he espied a great Heard of Goats, which fled the Storm as fast as they could, hasting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus calling to mind, that he had also by an other Oracle been directed to follow the first Troop of those Beasts, that should either lead him or fly before him; he pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkness of the Air, he entred their City without resistance, and possest it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cissens, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Cœnus succeeded Caranus, and raigned twelve years. Tyrimas followed Cœnus, and ruled eight and twenty years. Paus. Dion. Chus. Theop. Antios. 6. Euseb. in Chron.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrimas, governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great Valour, and many other Vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Pliny, Justin, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirm, that he appointed a place of Burial for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Ægæ; assuring them that the Kingdom should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their Bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the Posterity of the Temenidæ failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas. Sol. c. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Argeus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years. Euseb. in Chron.

Philip the first, his Successor, raigned eight and twenty years.

Europus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose Infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great Victory, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians gathering new Forces, and resolving either to recover their former Loss, or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the Field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of Honour and Compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his Servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Aimoinus, of Clotarius the Son of Fredegunda. Euseb. Justin. Ammian. Theod. Ant. &c. Aimon. l. 3. c. 82.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and raigned fifty years; he lived at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supream Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent Behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the Son of Amyntas, and his Successor. Her. Euseb. Justin. &c.

Alexander, surnamed the Rich, the Son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and forty years. He did not only appease the Wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giving Gygæa his Sister, to Bubares of the Blood of Persia, but by that Match he grew so great in Xerxes Grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedon. Yet could not these Benefits buy his Affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Army; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three Sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip. Her. l. 8. Plut. Eusch. Just. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the Son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian War, and raigned in all eight and twenty years. The Wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces, in Thucidides his first six Books. He left behind him two Sons; Perdiccas, who was very young, and Archelaus, who was base born.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this Fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the Child in following a Goose hastily fell therein to by misadventure. But Archelaus staied not here: for having thus dispatched his Brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas, the Son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the Son of this Alcetas, his Cousin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon himself four and twenty years. Plat. in Gorg. Arist. Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked Murder, yet he performed many things greatly greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two Sons, Archelaus and Oreſtes.

Archelaus the ſecond ſucceeded his Father, and having reigned ſeven years, he was ſlain in hunting, either by chance or of purpoſe, by Cratæus.

Oreſtes his younger Son was committed to the Education of Æropus, of the Royal Blood of Macedon, and had the ſame meaſure which Archelaus had meaſured to his Pupil; for Æropus murdered him and uſurped the Kingdom, which he held ſome ſix years: the ſame who denied paſſage to Ageſilaus King of Sparta, who deſired after his return from the Aſian Expedition, to paſs by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod. Polyæn. Plut. in Demet. This Uſurper left three Sons, Pauſanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pauſanias ſucceeded his Father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the Son of Philip, the Son of the firſt Perdiccas, the Son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preſerved, when Archelaus the Baſtard ſlew his Brother Perdiccas, his Uncle Acetas, and his Son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years; for he was not only infeſted by Pauſanias, aſſiſted by the Thracians, and by his Brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the ſaid Argæus, for two years diſpoſſeſt of Macedon: but on the other ſide, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near the Ægæan Sea, made themſelves for a while Maſters of Pella, the chief City of Macedon.

Amyntas the ſecond had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sons; Alexander the ſecond, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the ſecond, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: he had alſo by his ſecond Wife Gygea, three Sons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward ſlain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomy, ſurnamed Alorites, of the City Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the ſecond reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pauſanias, the Son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was alſo conſtrained (for the payment of a great ſum of Money) to leave his youngeſt Brother Philip in Hoſtage with the Illyrians, who had ſubjected his Father Amyntas to the Payment of Tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevadæ againſt Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Theſſaly, having redeemed his Brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his aſſiſtance entred into Confederacy with Pelopidæ, being at that time in the ſame Country, with whom he alſo left Philip, with divers other principal perſons for the Gage of his Promiſes to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the Death of Alexander her Son, with a purpoſe to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was ſoon after Diod. l. 15. & 16. ſlain by Perdiccas the Brother of Alexander. Diodor hath it otherwiſe of Philips being made Pledge; and ſaith, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for Hoſtage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet living) was firſt ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for Hoſtage a ſecond time by Alexander his Brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had ſlain Alorites his baſe Brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then ſlain in a Battel againſt the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Juſtin affirmeth, that he periſhed by the practiſe of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did. Juſt. l. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips Reign, and how he delivered Macedon from the Troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the ſecond, the youngeſt Son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having been inſtructed in all knowledge requiſite unto the Government of a Kingdom, in that excellent Education which he had under Epaminondas, making an eſcape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the firſt year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourſcore and thirteen years: and finding the many Enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a Son, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the Men of War. Yet his fruitful Ambition ſoon overgrew his Modeſty, and he was eaſily perſwaded by the People to accept both the Title of King, and withal the abſolute Rule of the Kingdom. And to ſay the truth, The neceſſity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, beſides the incurſions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did ſet up in oppoſition Pauſanias; the Athenians, Argæus; Sons of the late Uſurper Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own Election. Theſe heavy Burthens when Philip could not well bear, he bought of the weightieſt by Money, and by fair Promiſes unloaded himſelf of ſo many of the reſt, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his Brother Perdiccas had his Death accompanied with four thouſand Macedonians, beſide theſe that were wounded and taken Priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all ſides and quarters of his Country: Yet after he had practiſed the Men of War of Pannonia; and corrupted them with Gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, he forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt Enemies; and, for the firſt, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the Frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus the Son of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heels in his Retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the Battel: which Argæus loſt, having the greateſt part of his Army ſlain in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a ſtrong piece of Ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the preſent Fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquiſhers Life and Liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a Peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this Clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks. Diod. l. 16.

§. III.

§. III.

The good Succeſs which Philip had in many Enterpriſes.

NOw had Philip leiſure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pæonians, his irreconcilable Enemies and Borderers: both which he invaded with ſo proſperous ſucceſs, as he ſlew Bardillas, King of the Illyrians, with ſeven thouſand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all thoſe places which the Illyrians held in Macedon; and withal, upon the Death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main Victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him Tribute. This was no ſooner done, than (without ſtaying to take longer breath) he haſted ſpeedily towards Lariſſa, upon the River Peneus in Theſſaly, of which Town he ſoon made himſelf Maſter; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made uſe in time following. Now although he reſolved either to ſubdue the Theſſalians, or to make them his own againſt all others, becauſe the Horſe-men of that Country were the beſt, and moſt feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it moſt for his ſafety to cloſe up the entrances out of Thrace, leſt while he invaded Theſſaly and Greece towards the South, thoſe ample Nations, lying towards the North, ſhould either withdraw him, or overrun Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, ſeated on the famous River of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He alſo recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (ſometime Datus) and called it after his own Name Philippi: to the People whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epiſtles. This place, wherein Philippi ſtood, is very rich in Mines of Gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips Affairs, he drew yearly a thouſand Talents, which make ſix hundred thouſand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more eaſe disburden the Thracian Shores of the Athenian Garriſons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into League with his Fathers malicious Enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to faſten unto him, he gave them the City of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing leſs than that they ſhould enjoy it, or their own Eſtate many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occaſion to deliver the City of Pheres in Theſſaly, from the Tyranny of Lycophron and Tiſiphonus. Who, after they had conſpired with Thebe the Wife of Alexander, who uſurped upon the Liberty of that State, they themſelves (Alexander being murthered) held it alſo by the ſame ſtrong hand and oppreſſion that Alexander did, till by the aſſiſtance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres reſtored to her former Liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after faſten the Theſſalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, bind them to his Service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War, which firſt drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the ſecond year of the hundred and ſixth Olympiad, eight years after the Battel of Mantinæa, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occaſions concur towards the execution of eternal Providence, and of every great alteration in the World there is ſome preceeding preparation, though not at the firſt eaſily diſcerned; ſo did this revengeful hatred by the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians, conceived againſt the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wreſt the Sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themſelves beating down their own Defences, to give him an eaſie paſſage, and beating themſelves, to give him Victory without peril, left nothing unperformed towards their own Slavery, ſaving the Title and Impoſition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their Victory at Leuctres) were the Inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphyctiones, or of the general Eſtates of Greece, in which, at that time, they ſwaied moſt, they cauſed both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater Sums of Money than they could well bear; the one for ſurpriſing the Caſtle of Cadmea in the time of Peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of Ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being reſolved not to obey this Edict, were ſecretly ſet on and incouraged by the Lacedæmonians: and for refuſal were expoſed as Sacrilegers, and accurſed to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade and deſtroy them at their pleaſures.

The Phocians perſwaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, caſt the ſame Dice of Hazard that Cæſar after many Ages following did; but had not the ſame Chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the Enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungratious Quarrel, of which there was left no hope of compoſition, they reſolved to ſack the Temple it ſelf. For ſeeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's Ground, they had ſo much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worſe could not befall them than already was intended; they reſolved to take the Gold with the Ground, and either to periſh for all, or to prevail againſt all that had commiſſion to call them to accompt. The Treaſure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War was ten thouſand Talents, which in thoſe days ſerved them to wage a great many men, and ſuch was their ſucceſs in the beginning of the War, as they won three great Battels againſt the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus caſt himſelf headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themſelves againſt their bad Neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their Quarrel, rendred themſelves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the Siege of Methone loſt one of his Eyes. It is ſaid, That he that ſhot him did purpoſely direct his Arrow towards him, and that it was written on the Shaft thereof: After Philippo, After to Philip; for ſo he was called that gave him the Wound. This City he evened with the Soil. Plut. Ulpian. Strab. l. 8.

The

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians engaged in the Holy War, entred Theſſaly with new Forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped ſo to entertain the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leiſure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſaly; but both the Theſſalians and Macedonians (Philip being preſent) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſaly, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame victorious Army brake the Forces of the Bœotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late miſadventure, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſaly, there to find again the Honour which he lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the Field twenty thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army overturned, ſix thouſand ſlain, and three thouſand taken; of which number, himſelf being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Thoſe that fled were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which ſailed alongſt the Coaſt, commanded by Chares; but the greateſt number of thoſe that took the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Theſſaly, and Pheres made free as before.

advantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrows ere he ſate down before the City it ſelf: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Laſthenes from their People, and from the ſervice of their Country and Common-weal; by whoſe Treaſon he entred the Town, ſlew his Brothers therein, ſackt it, and ſold the Inhabitants for Slaves by the Drum. By the ſpoil of this place he greatly enriched himſelf, and had Treaſure ſufficient to buy in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For ſo was he adviſed by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he ſhould make his aſſaults with Silver Spears: Whereupon Horace well and truly ſaid, ——Diffidit Urbium Hor. Carm.

Portas vir Macedo, & ſubruit æmulos 3. Od. 16.
Reges muneribus.——

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates aſunder,
And Kings envying his eſtate brought under.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his ſecret workers (which way of Conqueſt was well followed by Philip the ſecond of Spain:) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was choſen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Juſtice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and ſlain both Kings, gave Sentence for himſelf, and made the Kingdom his own.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FRom hence Philip reſolved to invade Phocis it ſelf, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into thoſe parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedæmonians they retrencht his paſſage at the Streights of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his Alliance, and bought his Peace of them. For the Olynthians were very ſtrong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is ſaid, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half-brother (for Amyntas had three Sons by Euridice the Mother of Philip, and three other Sons by Gygæa: but Philip's elder Brothers by the ſame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himſelf alſo of the reſt) the two younger held themſelves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cauſe of the War, Juſtine affirmeth. But juſt Quarrels are balanced by juſt Princes; for to this King all things were lawful that might any way ſerve his turn; all his affections and paſſions, how divers ſoever in other men, were in his ambition ſwallowed up, and thereinto converted. For he neither forbare the murder of his own Brothers, the breach of Faith, the buying of other mens Fidelity; he eſteemed no place ſtrong where his Aſs loaden with Gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greateſt, to be made greater, could loſe the ſenſe of other mens ſorrow and ſubjection. And becauſe he thought it vain to practiſe the winning of Olynthus, till he had incloſed all the power they had within their own Walls, he entred their Territory, and by the

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

THE War ſtill continuing between the Phocians and the Aſſociates of the Holy War, the Bœotians finding themſelves unable to ſubſiſt without ſome preſent aid, ſent unto Philip for ſuccour, who willingly yielded to their neceſſities, and ſent them ſuch a proportion of men as were neither ſufficient to maſter their Enemies, nor to aſſure themſelves; but yet to enable them to continue the War, and to waſte the ſtrength of Greece. They alſo ſent to Artaxerxes Ochus for ſupply of Treaſure, who lent them thirty Talents, which makes an hundred and fourſcore thouſand Crowns; but when with theſe ſupplies they had ſtill the worſt in all their attempts againſt the Phocians, who held from them three of their ſtrongeſt Cities within Bœotia it ſelf; they then beſought Philip of Macedon that he would aſſiſt them in perſon, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in that War.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himſelf in ſtate to give the law to both; and ſo quitting all his other purpoſes towards the North, he marched with a ſpeedy pace towards Bœotia; where being arrived, Phallecus, who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to ſhock with this Victorious King, made his own Peace, and with-drew himſelf with a Regiment of eight thouſand Souldiers into Peloponneſus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for concluſion, he had the glory of that War, called Sacred, which the Græcians with ſo many mutual ſlaughters had continued for ten years; and, beſides the glory, he poſſeſs'd himſelf of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corſia, in the Country of the Bœotians, who invited him to be victorious over themſelves. He brought the Phocians into ſervitude, and waſted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reſerving to himſelf the yearly Tribute of threeſcore Talents, which make ſix and thirty thouſand French Crowns. He alſo hereby (beſides the fame of Piety for ſervice of the Gods) obtained the ſame double voice in the Council of the Amphyctiones, which the Phocians had, with the ſuperintendency of the Pythian Games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian Sacriledge.

How Philip with ill ſucceſs attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip after his Triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parmenio, ſlaughtered many thouſands of the Illyrians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their Revenues. But his next enterpriſe againſt the Perinthians ſtaid his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, ſeated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Seſtos and Byzantium; a place of great ſtrength, and a People reſolved to defend their Liberty againſt Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and aſſiſted them. Philip ſate down before it with a puiſſant Army, made many fair Breaches, gave many furious Aſſaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repell'd with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual Aſſaults to weary them, and waſte both their Men and Munition, they were ſupplied, not only from the Perſian with Men and Money, and ſuccoured from Byzantium which ſtood upon the ſame Sea-coaſt, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatſoever was wanting to their neceſſity. But becauſe thoſe of Byzantium, by reaſon of their Neighbourhood, and the eaſie paſſage by Water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed with the one half of his Army and Beſieged it, leaving fifteen thouſand Foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be ſhort, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake divers enterpriſes at one time) and returned into Macedon with no leſs diſhonour than loſs: whereupon he made an Overture of Peace with the Athenians, and greatly deſired it; to which though Phocion perſwaded them in all he could, and that by the occaſion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions, yet Demoſthenes with his Eloquence prevailed in the refuſal. In the mean while, Philip having digeſted his late Affront, and ſupplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and threeſcore and ten Merchants Ships, he gathered new Forces, and being accompanied with his Son Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was alſo unproſperous in this enterpriſe: For the Triballi, a People of Mæſia, ſet on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greateſt part of the ſpoils which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip, overthrowing the Greeks in the Battel of Chæronæa, was choſen Captain-General of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among theſe Northern Nations (part of which he ſuppreſt, and part quieted) he ſpent ſome eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the Holy War, he was to his great advantage invited again by the Græcians to their aſſiſtance. For the Citizens of Amphiſſa having diſobeyed the Decree of the Amphictiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reaſon that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphiſſenſians, the reſt were not of themſelves able to conſtrain them, they beſought Philip to come in perſon to their aſſiſtance. Now you muſt think that Philip was not long in reſolving upon this enterpriſe; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other diſſwaſion than a maſtring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the ſame being compounded of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wan Platæa, and brought into ſubjection all that Region.

The reſt, and eſpecially the Athenians, although they had good cauſe to fear that a great part of this ſtorm would fall on themſelves, yet were they diſſwaded by Demoſthenes from accepting ſuch reaſonable Conditions of Peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their Eſtates and their Freedom to the chance of one Battel, than to hold it either by compoſition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators Eloquence coſt them dear. It is true, that he could far more eaſily mind them of the vertue of their Anceſtors, than make them to be ſuch as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving paſſion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Perſians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Ariſtides, a Themiſtocles, or a Cimon, or any of thoſe famous Commanders, whoſe great vertues they had paid with the greateſt ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the ſtrength of a contrary Faction he was at this time in diſgrace, and not employed: in ſo much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates encountred, although ſome thouſand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well near of the Thebans died with them, yet the want of worthy men on that ſide to hold up the reſt, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing Fortune, as it gave to Philip ſo ſhining a Victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in deſpight of all the Nations interjacent) into Perſia, India, and Ægypt; ſo it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Græcian glory: Yea, their liberty (ſaith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with ſo many difficulties, continued for ſo many Ages, and ſo often defended againſt the greateſt Kings, was now loſt in a moment, and for ever loſt.

Now this adviſed King (never paſſionate to his diſadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Soveraignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General againſt the Perſians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let go thoſe Athenians that were taken at this Battel of Cheronæa, as he alſo forbare to attempt any thing againſt their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the reſt) he lodged a Garriſon of Macedonians. And being ſoon after (according unto the long deſire which he had nouriſhed of this Soveraignty) by the general States at Corinth, ſtiled The firſt Commander of all the Græcians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded pounded an Army of great ſtrength, and under the commandment of Attalus and Parmenio, tranſported the ſame over the Helleſpont into Aſia, to begin the War. Of his enterpriſe againſt Perſia he ſought the ſucceſs from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received ſuch another convertible Riddle, as Cræſus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like ſort miſtaken in the expoſition.

But as it is hard to diſcern and withſtand the flatteries of our own appetites, ſo did Philip's ambitious deſire to invade Perſia, abuſe his judgment ſo far, that the death, wherewith himſelf was threatned, he underſtood to be delivered of his Enemy, whom he intended preſently to invade. Before his purpoſed departure into Aſia, he prepared for the Marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus; to which Feaſt and Paſtimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal perſons of the Græcian Cities, from whom he received much Honour and many rich Preſents; but this was indeed the Feaſt of his Funeral. For having refuſed to do juſtice to one Pauſanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had firſt made drunk, and then left to be carnally abuſed by divers baſe perſons, this Pauſanias grew into ſo great deteſtation of the Kings partiality in ſo foul a fact, as when Philip was paſſing towards the Theater, he drew a Sword from under his long Garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived ſix and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Juſtine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pauſanias to Murder the King her Husband, which after his death ſhe boldly avowed, by the honour ſhe did unto Pauſanias, in crowning his dead Body, in conſecrating his Sword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatneſs were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities, and Iſſue.

NOW although he were then taken from the World, when he had maſtred all oppoſition on that ſide the Sea, and had ſeen the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripeneſs and perfection, yet he was herein happy, that he lived to ſee his Son Alexander at mans eſtate, and had himſelf been an Eye-witneſs of his reſolution, and ſingular Valour in this laſt Battel.

The foundation of whoſe future greatneſs he had laid ſo ſoundly for him, with ſo plain a pattern of the buildings which himſelf meant to erect, as the performance and finiſhing was far more eaſie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were unto Philip, though leſs famous. For beſides the recovery of Macedon it ſelf, in competition between him and the Sons of Æropus, the one aſſiſted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians; and beſides the regaining of many places poſſeſs'd by the Illyrians, the cruſhing of all thoſe Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olynthus, a State that deſpiſed the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great ſtrength and ancient freedom, and the ſubjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for ſo many Ages had defended it ſelf againſt the greateſt Kings of the World, and won upon them: He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, ſo many choice Commanders, as the moſt of them both for their valour and judgment in the War, were no leſs worthy of Crowns, than himſelf was that wore a Crown: For it was ſaid of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungrateful to ſo great vertue, impiouſly murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio, never did any thing worthy of Renown; as for the reſt of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of ſuch a Father, yet did they not after Alexander's death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themſelves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exerciſe of more Vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had enriched him with Vertues. For beſides that he was Valiant, Wiſe, Learned, and Maſter of all his Affections, he had this ſavour of Piety, that he rather laboured to ſatisfie thoſe that were grieved, than to ſuppreſs them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcadion and Nicanor; whom, when for their evil ſpeech of Philip, his familiars perſwaded him to put to death; He anſwered them, That firſt it ought to be conſidered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himſelf: Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well ſpoken of; and this was ſhortly proved; for after Philip had relieved their neceſſities, there was none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told thoſe that had perſwaded him to uſe violence, that he was a better Phyſitian for evil ſpeech than they were.

His Epiſtles to Alexander his Son are remembred by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Chryſoſtom exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Frontinus, his wiſe ſayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his Reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof: for Amyntas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his Infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's baſe Son Aridæus, her Uncle by the Mothers ſide: both which Olympias, Philip's firſt Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus by extream torments: Eurydice ſhe ſtrangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Moloſſians, (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander's death ſlain at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his ſecond Wife, he had Cyna, married as is ſhewed before.

By Nicaſipolis, the Siſter of Jaſon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Theſſalonica, whom Caſſander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but ſhe was afterward by her Father-in-law, Antipater, put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Neece of Attalus, he had Carranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, cauſed to be roaſted to death in a Copper Pan. Other lay this Murder on Alexander himſelf. By the ſame Cleopatra he had likewiſe a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias alſo murdered at the Mothers breaſt.

Athen. l. 13. c. 2. Juſt. l. 3.

By Phila and Meda he had no Iſſue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom, after he had gotten with Child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomy, King of Ægypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

A brief rehearsal of Alexander's doings, before he invaded Asia.

ALEXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no less valiant by Nature, than by Education; well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his Reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years after Rome built, and after his own Birth twenty years. The strange Dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the Gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as fooliſh tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a Work the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his Birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the news of three several Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppress, began to consult about the recovery of their former Liberty, and to adventure it by force of Arms. Alexander's young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling Humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tomb; and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present Journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Council of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-General against the Persians, upon which War Philip his Father had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same Title of General Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth; for he receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had united themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereto perswaded by the Gold of Persia; the device he used was more subtile than profitable, for he caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slain in a Battel against the Triballes, and brought into the Assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirm, That himself was present and wounded in the Battel. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now adays defined by falshood and knavery) that devised rumours and lies, if they serve the turn, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true, that common People are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perillous, summoned to assemble; so do all men in general condemn the venters of such trumpery, and for them fear upon necessary occasions to entertain the truth it self. This labour unlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his Sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Græcians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the Wind, shall hardly attain the Port which he purposeth to recover: and it no less becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Græcians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off; neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath entangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other savage People, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which after divers overthrows given them, he made Peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good success, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than Liberty; the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Cittadel a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteth to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand Foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand Horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some days to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling indeed he was to draw bloud of the Græcians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) instead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then laid in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for Slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did, to the terror of the other Græcian Cities.

Many Arguments were used by Cleadas, one of the Prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather misled by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but against his Successor. He also besought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his Education in that City; yea, that his Ancestor Hercules was born therein: but all perswasions were fruitless; the times wherein offences are committed, do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to Learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the Sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the Liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble Woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatned to take her life, unless she would confess her Treasure; she led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it; and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now, because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them Peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains, wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his Fortune, or rather the Providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Græcians betook themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few days he invadeth.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did pass the Hellespont, and being ready to dis-embarque, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their own Territory, or to burn or deface those Buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Army, consisting of two and thirty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a Solemn Sacrifice upon Achilles Tomb, his maternal Ancestor.

But before he left his own Coast, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his Tributary Princes, of whose Fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust Cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered, and rooted up; those whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his Mother, Friends, and Children, fell by such another mercilesse Sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead Body to the Grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia-side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having stiled him his Servant on a Letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyalty and audacity (for Darius entituled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the Gods) he gave order withal to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with Rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his Ships, and send the Macedons taken Prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Æthiopia, or some other unhealthful part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartless multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men beat them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the Field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his Enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail against those of less courage than themselves; men that took more care how to embroider with Gold and Silver their upper Garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to Arm themthemſelves with Iron and Steel againſt the ſharp Pikes, Swords, and Darts of the hardy Macedonians; I ſay beſides all theſe, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every of them with the care of their own ſafety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own Breath, and that of their Horſes, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to inrich themſelves with the Gold and Jewels of Perſia, both which they needed, ſo the Perſians who expected nothing in that War but Blows and Wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to conſtrain them in aſſembling themſelves for his Service; but their own Fears and Cowardice, which in time of danger had moſt power over them, they only then obeyed, when their Rebellion againſt ſo ſervile a Paſſion did juſtly and violently require it. For ſaith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prælium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam ſciendum eſt in pugnâ uſum amplius prodeſſe quàm vires; As the well-practiſed Souldier deſires to come to battel, ſo the raw one fears it: for we muſt underſtand, that in Fight it more avails to have been accuſtomed unto the like, than only to have rude ſtrength. What manner of men the Perſians were, Alexander diſcovered in the firſt Encounter, before which time it is ſaid, by thoſe that writ his Story, That it was to hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conqueſt of an Empire ſo well peopled, with a handful of men, or the ſucceſs he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which ſevereth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Perſians ſought to ſtop his paſſage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and ſcale from the Level of the water; great reſiſtance (ſaith Curtius) was made by the Perſians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it ſeems to me, that the Victory then gotten was exceeding eaſie, and that the twenty thouſand Perſian Foot-men ſaid to be ſlain, were rather kill'd in the back in running away, than hurt in the boſoms by reſiſting. For had thoſe twenty thouſand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Horſemen, or, after Plutarch, two thouſand and five hundred Horſe-men, died with their Faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their Lives at ſo ſmall a rate, as with the loſs of four and thirty of all ſorts of his own. And if it were alſo true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Perſian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhæſaces, and that the Perſian Horſe-men fought with great fury, though in the end ſcattered; and laſtly, how thoſe Græcians in Darius his Pay, holding themſelves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after Mercy was refuſed them) fight it out to the laſt; how doth it then reſemble truth, that ſuch reſiſtance having been made, yet of Alexanders Army there fell but twelve Foot-men, and two and twenty Horſe-men.

ed all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, ſome one or two Towns excepted. For in all invaſions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights and Mountains, they will ſoon have perſwaded themſelves, that ſuch an Enemy, upon equal terms and even ground, can hardly be reſiſted. It was therefore Machiavels Counſel, that he which reſolveth to defend a Paſſage, ſhould with his ableſt Force oppoſe the Aſſailant. And to ſay truth, few Regions of any great circuit are ſo well fenced, that Armies of ſuch Force as may be thought ſufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficulty of the ways. One Paſſage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then muſt the Forces of the Country be diſtracted, and yet lightly, ſome one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies breaking into Italy? Yea, where ſhall we find that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they ſuch, as (to ſpeak briefly) afflict with all difficulties thoſe that travel over them; but they give no ſecurity to thoſe that lye behind them: for they are of two large extent. The Towns of Lombardy perſwaded themſelves that they might enjoy their Quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from deſcending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whileſt theſe Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in thoſe Mountains had made fitteſt of all other for ſuch a ſervice, were buſied in cuſtody of the Alpes, Francis appeared in Lombardy, to ſo much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the leſs they had expected his arrival. What ſhall we ſay of thoſe Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in ſuch ſort, as they leave but one Gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and thoſe of Thermopylæ, have ſeldom been attempted, perhaps becauſe they were thought impregnable: but how ſeldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans forced the entrance of Thermopylæ, Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how ſtrongly ſoever they had been locked and barred, yet were thoſe Countries open enough to a Fleet that ſhould enter on the backſide. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all Hiſtories that bear good witneſs. The deepeſt have many Foords; the ſwifteſt and broadeſt may be paſſed by Boats, in caſe it be found a matter of difficulty to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his own Bank, hath alſo enough to beat his Enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loſs, than by ſtriving in vain to hinder the Paſſage, as a matter tending to his own diſadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an Opinion, that they are in an ill caſe, having their means of ſafegard taken from them, by the Skill or Valour of ſuch as are too good for them. Certainly if a River were ſufficient defence againſt an Army, the Iſle of Mona, now called Angleſey, which is divided from North-Wales by an Arm of the Sea, had been ſafe enough againſt the Romans, invading it under conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to ſpend the time in making Veſſels to tranſport his Forces, did aſſay the Foords; Whereby he ſo amazed the Enemies attending for Ships and ſuch like Proviſion by Sea, that ſurely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came ſo minded to War, they humbly intreated for Peace, and yielded the Iſland.

§. III.

A Digreſſion concerning the defence of hard paſſages. Of things following the Battel of Granick.

THe winning of this Paſſage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought ſuch terror upon all thoſe of the leſſer Aſia, as he obtain-Island. Yet the Britains were men ſtout enough; the Perſians very Daſtards.

It was therefore wiſely done of Alexander, to paſs the River of Granick in face of the Enemy; not marching higher to ſeek an eaſier way, not labouring to convey his men over it by ſome ſafer means. For having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no leſs of their Reputation than of their Strength, leaving no hope of ſuccour to the partakers and followers of ſuch unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Epheſus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magneſia, which were rendred unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the People of the Country, he received with great grace, ſuffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he obſerved it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus utilis clementiæ fama; It is commodious unto ſuch as lay the Foundations of a new Sovereignty to have the Fame of being merciful. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force maſtred Halicarnaſſus, which, becauſe it reſiſted obſtinately, he razed to the ground. From thence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been caſt out of all that ſhe held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, preſented her ſelf unto him, and adopted him her Son and Succeſſor; which Alexander accepted in ſo gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her diſpoſing. He then entred into Lycia and Pamphilia, and obtained all the Sea-Coaſts, and ſubjecting unto him Piſidia, he directed himſelf towards Darius (who was ſaid to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Aſia the Leſs, bordering upon the Sea, his firſt Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the Government and ſetling of Lycia, and Pamphilia, he ſent Cleander to raiſe ſome new Companies in Peloponneſus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, ſeated on the River Mæander, which was abandoned unto him, the Caſtle only holding out, which alſo after forty days was given up: for ſo long time he gave them to attend Succour from Darius. From Celenas he paſs'd on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regal Seat, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian Knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it aſunder with his Sword: For there was an ancient Propheſie did promiſe to him that could untie it, the Lordſhip of all Aſia; whereupon Alexander, not reſpecting the manner how, ſo it were done, aſſumed to himſelf the fulfilling of the Propheſie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Aſia the Leſs towards the Eaſt, he took care to clear the Sea-Coaſt on his back, and to thruſt the Perſians out of the Iſlands of Lesbos, Scio, and Coos, the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them ſuch order as he thought to be moſt convenient for that Service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the Charge; and withal, out of his firſt ſpoil gotten, he ſent threeſcore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece, and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Angori, ſtanding on the ſame River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gorgium: there he muſtred his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whoſe People ſubmitted themſelves unto him, and obtained freedom of Tribute: where he left Catus Governour, with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he underſtood of the Death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to paſs on towards him, for of this only Captain he had more reſpect than of all the Multitude by Darius aſſembled, and of all the Commanders he had beſides. For ſo much hath the Spirit of ſome one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greateſt States and Commonwealths, the Erection of Monarchies, the Conqueſt of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfuls of men againſt multitudes of equal bodily ſtrength, contrived Victories beyond all hope and diſcourſe of reaſon, converted the fearful Paſſions of his own Followers into magnanimity, and the Valour of his Enemies into Cowardize; ſuch ſpirits have been ſtirred up in ſundry Ages of the World, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and caſt down again, to eſtabliſh and to deſtroy, and to bring all things, Perſons and States to the ſame certain ends, which the infinite ſpirit of the Univerſal, piercing, moving, and governing all things hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man elſe: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the leſſer Aſia, it is like enough that he would have contented himſelf with ſome part thereof, and not have diſcovered the River of Indus, as this man did. The ſwift courſe of Victory, wherewith he ran over ſo large a Portion of the World, in ſo ſhort a ſpace, may juſtly be imputed unto this, That he was never encountred by an equal Spirit, concurring with equal Power againſt him. Hereby it came to paſs that his actions being limited by no greater oppoſition than deſart places, and the meer length of tedious Journeys could make, were like the Coloſſus of Rhodes, not ſo much to be admired for the Workmanſhip, though therein alſo praiſe-worthy, as for the huge Bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, diſcover as brave a Spirit as Alexanders, and working no leſs exquiſitely, though the effects were leſs material, as were alſo the Forces and Power of Command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, muſt look upon ſuch as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and thoſe better followed than themſelves, have by their ſingular Vertue overtopped their valiant Enemies, and ſtill prevailed over thoſe that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as theſe are do ſeldom live to obtain great Empires; for it is a Work of more labour and longer time, to maſter the equal Forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly ſubdue a multitude of ſervile Nations, compounding the body of a groſs unweildy Empire. Wherefore theſe Parvo Potentes, men that with little have done much upon Enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choiſe examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the ſubſtance of their actions, than the exquiſite managing: exactneſs and greatneſs concurring ſo ſeldom, that I can find no inſtance of both in one, ſave only that brave Roman Cæſar.

Having thus far digreſſed, it is now time that we return unto our Eaſtern Conqueror, who is travelling haſtily towards Cilicia, with a deſire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius ſhould arrive there. But firſt making a diſpatch into Greece, he ſent to thoſe Cities, in which he repoſed moſt truſt, ſome of the Perſian Targets which he had recovered in his firſt Battel; upon which, by certain Inſcriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well adviſed himſelf; for he he that doth not as well impart of the Honour which he gaineth in the Wars, as he doth of the Spoils, ſhall never be long followed by thoſe of the better ſort. For men which are either well born or well bred, and have more of Wealth than of Reputation, do as often ſatisfie themſelves with the purchaſe of Glory, as the Weak in Fortune, and Strong in Courage, do with the gain of Gold and Silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander's coming on, left ſome Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defenſible; and withal, as Curtius noteth, he began over-late to prize and put in execution the Counſel of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars adviſed him to waſt all the Proviſions for Men and Horſe, that could not be lodged in ſtrong places, and always to give ground to the Invader, till he found ſome ſuch notable advantage as might aſſuredly promiſe him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army is beſt broken by delays, change of Diet, and want, eating ſometimes too little, and ſometimes too much, ſometimes reposing themſelves in Beds, and more oftner on the cold Ground. Theſe and the like ſudden alterations bring many Diſeaſes upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from Meat and Sleep, and refuſing to give or take Battel, had wearied them with his light Horſe, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have ſaved his own Life and his Eſtate: For it was one of the greateſt Incouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and laſt fatal Battel, that they were to fight with all the ſtrength of Perſia at once.

Xerxes when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, loſt only his Men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, loſt his Kingdom; Pericles, though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a Battel: for the Invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Becauſe we read Hiſtories to inform our Underſtanding by the Examples therein found, we will give ſome inſtances of thoſe that have periſhed by adventuring in their own Countries to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their Deſtruction.

Pompey was well adviſed for a while, when he gave Cæſar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharſalia, he loſt the Battel, loſt the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conqueſt of Naples, would needs fight a Battel with the French to his Confuſion, though it was told him by a man of ſound judgment, that thoſe Counſels which promiſe ſurety in all things are honourable enough.

The Conſtable of France made fruſtrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by waſting the Country, and forbearing the Fight; ſo did the Duke of Alua weary the French in Naples, and diſſolve the boiſterous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a Battel with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be perſwaded to linger the time, and ſtay their advantage; but they loſt eight and twenty thouſand upon the place. Philip of Valois ſet upon King Edward at Creſſy, and King John (when the Engliſh were well near tired out, and would in ſhort time by an orderly purſuit have been waſted to nothing) conſtrained the black Prince with great fury, near Poitiers, to joyn Battel with him: But all men know what lamentable ſucceſs theſe two French Kings found. Charles the Fifth of France made an other kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the Engliſh burnt and waſted many places, yet this King held his reſolution to forbear Blows, and followed his advice which told him, That the Engliſh could never get his Inheritance by ſmoak; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to ſay of this Charles, that he won from him the Dutchy of Guien without ever putting on his Armor.

But where God hath a purpoſe to deſtroy, wiſe men grow ſhort lived, and the charge of things is committed unto ſuch as either cannot ſee what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any ſound advice. The courſe which Memnon had propounded, muſt, in all appearance of reaſon, have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him ſtand ſtill a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more ſhameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been waſted whileſt Alexander was far off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arſenes, Governour of that Province, with the beſt of his Forces: hunger would not have ſuffered the Enemy to ſtay the tryal of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that paſſage; or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia at better leiſure have been ſo throughly ſpoiled, that the Heart of his Army ſhould have been broken, by ſeeking out miſeries with painful travel.

But Arſenes leaving a ſmall number to defend the Streights, took the beſt of his Army with him, to waſt and ſpoil the Country; or rather, as may ſeem, to find himſelf ſome work, by pretence of which he might honeſtly run further away from Alexander. He ſhould rather have adventured his Perſon in cuſtody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have ſaved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the Fields would have been conveyed into ſtrong Towns. So ſhould his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himſelf with his Horſemen have had the leſs work in deſtroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cauſe to wiſh for Alexander's coming, and as great cauſe to the Keepers of the Paſſage not to hinder it. For Cowards are wiſe in apprehending all forms of danger. Theſe Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arſenes made all haſt to joyn himſelf with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one deſpairing of the defence, began to grow circumſpect, and to think that ſurely their General, who gave as loſt the Country behind their backs, had expoſed themſelves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing elſe but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Country (which Honour they ſaw that Arſenes himſelf could well forbear) they ſpeedily followed the foot-ſteps of their General, gleaning after his Harveſt. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the Cowardice of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Perſian ſide by their indiſcretion.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius againſt Alexander. The unadviſed courſes which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquiſhed at Iſſus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made Priſoners, of ſome things following the Battel of Iſſus.

IN the mean ſeaſon Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thouſand Souldiers, out of divers Nations: Juſtine muſters them at three hundred thouſand Foot, and an hundred thouſand Horſe; Plutarch at ſix hundred thouſand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius deſcribes it, was rather like a Masker than a Man of War; and like one that took more care to ſet out his Glory and Riches, than to provide for his own ſafety, perſwading himſelf, as it ſeemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and ſumptuous Pageants. For, before the Army there was carried the holy fire which the Perſians worſhipped, attended by their Prieſts, and after them three hundred and threeſcore and five young men, anſwering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter, drawn with white Horſes, with their Riders cloathed in the ſame colour, with Rods of Gold in their hands; and after it, the Horſe of the Sun. Next after theſe followed ten ſumptuous Chariots, inlaid and garniſh'd with Silver and Gold; and then the Vantguard of their Horſe, compounded of twelve ſeveral Nations, which the better to avoid confuſion, did hardly underſtand each others Language, and theſe marſhalled in the head of the reſt, being beaten, might ſerve very fitly to diſorder all that followed them; in the tail of theſe Horſes the Regiment of Foot marched, with the Perſians called immortal, becauſe if any died, the number was preſently ſupplied: and theſe were armed with Chains of Gold, and their Coats with the ſame metal embroidered, whereof the ſleeves were garniſhed with Pearl, baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to perſwade them that it were great incivility to cut and to deface ſuch glorious Garments. But it was well ſaid, Sumptuoſè inductus miles, ſe virtute ſuperiorem aliis non exiſtimet, cum in prelijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non veſtimentis muniri, quoniam hoſtes veſtibus non debellantur; Let no man think that he exceedeth thoſe in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought againſt the Samnites in that fatal Battel, wherein they all ſware either to prevail or die, thirty thouſand of them having apparelled themſelves in white garments, with high Creſts and great plumes of Feathers, bad the Roman Souldiers to lay aſide all fear: Non enim criſtas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata ſcuta tranſire Romanum pilum; For theſe plumed creſts would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded Shields.

Livie l. 10.

To ſecond this Court-like company, fifteen thouſand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and theſe were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinſmen. Then came Darius himſelf, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe riding before his Chariot, which was ſupported with the Gods of his Nation, caſt and cut in pure Gold; theſe the Macedonians did not ſerve, but they ſerved their turns of theſe, by changing their maſſie-bodies into thin portable and currant coin. The head of this Chariot was ſet with precious ſtones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged Eagle of the ſame metal: The hinder part being raiſed high whereon Darius ſate, had a covering of ineſtimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thouſand Horſe-men, their Lances plated with Silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to embrue in the Macedonian bloud, for fear of marring their beauty. He had for the proper Guard of his Perſon two hundred of the bloud Royal, bloud too Royal and precious to be ſpilt by any valorous adventure; (I am of opinion that two hundred ſturdy Fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more ſervice) and theſe were backt with thirty thouſand Foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred ſpare Horſes for the King, which if he had meant to have uſed he would have marſhalled ſomewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rearward, the ſame being led by Siſygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on Horſe-back, with fifteen Waggons of the Kings Children, and the Wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurſes and Eunuchs, moſt ſumptuouſly apparelled: By which it ſhould ſeem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this Troup was far fitter to behold thoſe ſports than to be preſent at Battels. Between theſe and a company of ſlight-armed Slaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings Treaſure, charged on ſix hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this ſort came this May-game-King into the Field, incumbred with a moſt unneceſſary train of Strumpets, attended with troups of divers Nations, ſpeaking divers Languages, and for their numbers impoſſible to be marſhalled; and for the moſt part ſo effeminate, and ſo rich in Gold and in Garments, as the ſame could not but have encouraged the nakedeſt Nation of the World againſt them. We find it in daily experience that all diſcourſe of Magnanimity, of National Vertue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatſoever elſe hath been wont to move and encourge vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in compariſon of Spoil and Riches. The rich Ships are boarded upon all diſadvantages, the rich Towns are furiouſly aſſaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our Engliſh Nations have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of Plate, and Piſtolets, which had they been put to it upon the like diſadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes againſt their Commanders, conteſting that they had been brought without reaſon to the butchery and ſlaughter. It is true, that the War is made willingly, and for the moſt part with good ſucceſs, that is ordained againſt the richeſt Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, ſo plenty is wont to ſhun peril; and men that have well to live, do rather ſtudy how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car où il n'y a rien a gaigner, que des coups volontiers il n'y va pas; No man makes haſte to the Market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now, if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his conſultation with his Soothſayers, he would have ſatisfied himſelf by the out-ſides of the Perſians, and never have looked into the entrails of Beaſts for ſucceſs. For leaving the deſcription of this ſecond Battel (which is indeed no where well deſcribed, neither for the confuſion and haſty running away of the Aſians could it be) we have enough by the ſlaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of reſiſtance was made. For if it be true that threeſcore thouſand Perſian Foot-men were ſlain in this Battel, with ten thouſand of their Horſe-men: Or (as Curtius ſaith) an hundred thouſand Foot-men, with the ſame number of Horſe-men, and beſides this ſlaughter, forty thouſand taken Priſoners; while of Alexander's Army there miſcarried but two hundred and fourſcore of all ſorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Hiſtorians cut off almoſt the one half: I do verily believe that this ſmall number rather died with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing their Enemies, than by any ſtroaks received from them. And ſurely if the Perſian Nation (at this time degenerate, and the baſeſt of the World) had had any ſavour remaining of the antient Valour of their fore-fathers, they would never have ſold ſo good cheap, and at ſo vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings Children, had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings ſafety and his Eſtate at leſs. Darius by this time found it true that Charidemus, a baniſhed Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had aſſembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the Country, whom in paſſing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to aſſail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, embattelled in groſs Squadrons, which they call their Phallanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furniſhed with Weapons for offence of great advantage, would make ſo little account of his delicate Perſians, loving their eaſe and their palat, being withal ill armed and worſe diſciplined, as except it would pleaſe him to entertain (having ſo great abundance of Treaſure to do it withal) a ſufficient number of the ſame Græcians, and ſo to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him over-late, as taught by the miſerable ſucceſs like to follow.

But this diſcourſe was ſo unpleaſing to Darius (who had been accuſtomed to nothing ſo much as to his own praiſes, and to nothing ſo little as to hear truth;) as he commanded that this poor Græcian ſhould be preſently ſlain: who while he was afundring in the Tormentors hands, uſed this ſpeech to the King, That Alexander, againſt whom he had given this good Counſel, ſhould aſſuredly revenge his death, and lay deſerved puniſhment upon Darius for deſpiſing his advice.

It was the ſaying of a Wiſe man: Deſperata ejus Principis ſalus eſt, cujus aures ita formatæ ſunt, ut aſpera quæ utilia, nec quicquam niſi jucundum accipiat; That Princes ſafety is in a deſperate caſe, whoſe Ears judge all that is profitable to be too ſharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleaſant.

For liberty in Counſel is the life and eſſence of Counſel; Libertas conſilii eſt ejus vita, & eſſentia, qua erepta conſilium evaneſcit.

Darius did likewiſe value at nothing the Advice given him by the Græcian Souldiers that ſerved him, who intreated him not to fight in the Straights: but had they been Counſellors and directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good Troup of Horſe-men been able to have oppoſed the fury of Alexander, without any aſſiſtance of the Perſian Foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confuſed Rabble, thoſe Græcians, under their Captain Amyntas, held firm, and marched away in order, in deſpight of the vanquiſhers. Old Souldiers are not eaſily diſmayed: we read in Hiſtories Ancient and Modern, what brave retreats have been made by them, though the reſt of the Army in which they have ſerved, hath been broken.

At the Battel of Ravenne, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undiſmayed; whom when Gaſton de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the Victory not entire by their eſcape, he was overturned and ſlain in the place. For it is truly ſaid of thoſe men, who, by being acquainted with dangers fear them not: That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali opus ipſum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They go about the buſineſs it ſelf, how hard ſoever it be, not ſtanding to conſider of the danger, which the miſchief hanging over their heads may bring: and as truly of thoſe that know the Wars but by heart-ſay. Quod valentes ſunt & prevalentes ante pericula, in ipſis tamen periculis diſcedunt; They have ability enough, and to ſpare, till dangers appear; but when peril indeed comes, they get them gone.

Theſe Græcians alſo that made the retract, adviſed Darius to retire his Army into the Plain of Meſopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into thoſe large Fields and great Champions, he might have environed the Macedonians on all ſides with his multitude; and withal they counſelled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one ſtroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many Battels, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marſhalled and conducted. But this counſel was ſo contrary to the cowardly affections of the Perſians, as they perſwaded Darius to environ the Græcians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wiſdom of God doth not work always by one and the ſame way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Eſtates, by taking underſtanding from the Governours, ſo as they can neither give nor diſcern of Counſels. For Darius, that would needs fight with Alexander upon a ſtraightned piece of ground, near unto the City of Iſſus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parmenio ſtaid there, as in a place of beſt advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treaſure loſt, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Græcians his followers had perſwaded him to leave in Babylon, or elſewhere) taken Priſoners, and all their train of Ladies ſpoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexander's preſence, were entertained with all reſpect due unto their Birth, their Honours preſerved, and their Jewels and rich Garments reſtored unto them; and though Darius's Wife was a moſt beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander maſtred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Ariſtobulus the Hiſtorian, That he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damaſcus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Perſia in effect, fell into Captivity; at which time alſo Darius's Treaſure (not loſt at Iſſus) was ſeized, amount-amounting to six thousand and two hundred Talents of Coin, and of Bullion five hundred Talents, with a world of Riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his Brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains (casting the Crown from his Head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phœnicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the People) acknowledged Alexander. Good Fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexander's Lieutenant in Asia the less, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius's Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last Battel, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Ægypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander, to honour Ephestion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor Estate, that laboured to sustain his life, being of the Royal bloud, was commended by the People unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wish'd that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietness of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not govern, his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a Letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of Peace, but such as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornful answer upon the offer of Peace, than they did before the tryal of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leaf; the one resolved well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not only directed his Letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

How Alexander besieged and won the City of Tyre.

Alexander coming near to the City of Tyre, received from them the Present of a golden Crown, with great store of Victuals, and other Presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoyning, now abandoned and desolate: To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of Stone from the old Tyre, and Timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of Wind, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torn asunder, yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the Siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven Months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the Siege had barbarously drowned the Messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the Sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the first fury, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for Slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by Shipping unto their own City. Arrian. l. Just. l. 18.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Town was taken, for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this God meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden Chain to the Idol of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the Channel, that lay between the Island and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Son of Parmenio; Cilicia he committed to Socrates and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephestion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Ægypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deals graciously with the Jews.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the loss of the last Battel to the straightness of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatning to encompass him in the plain Countries; he bids him consider, how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearful things: for, he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had Arguments enough of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Alys and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which Victory and his own Vertue had possess'd him of: That he was to give Conditions, and not to receive any; and that he having passed the Sea it self, disdained to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old, and full of Honour and Riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Ægypt, and coming before Gaza, Betis, a faithful Servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an obstinate resolution, at the Siege whereof Alexander received a Wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his leg with a stone: He found better men in this place than he did at the former Battels, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the Sands of Gaza, that he was forc'd to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Josephus calleth Babemeses) that was weakened with many Wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assailants; he bored holes through his Feet, and caused him to be drawn about the streets, whilest he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himself, disdained to ask him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his Tyranny, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath always somewhat to cover her deformity.

Joseph. Ant. l. 11. c. 8.

L. 11. c. ult.

From Gaza (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem, a City, for the Antiquity and great Fame thereof, well known unto him while he lay before Tyre; he had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the High Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their Estates and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontifical-Robes, to wit, an upper Garment of Purple, embroidered with Gold, with his Miter, and the Plate of Gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich Ornaments, and the People in white Garments, in a manner so unusual, stately, and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the High Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the success after the Prophecy of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the Conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or fear him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) That in Dio, a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the Conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a Person as Jaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of Victory. This Apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his Phantasie, he now beheld with his bodily Eyes; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phœnicians, (who hoped to have sack'd and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they desired, both of Liberty and Immunity, with permission to live under their own Laws, and to exercise and enjoy their own Religion.

Alexander wins Ægypt; and makes a Journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Jerusalem Alexander turned again towards Ægypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred Talents of Treasure, and all other the Kings Riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgment, gave to the valianteſt man he had but the command of one City, and to the veriest Coward the Government of all Ægypt. When he had set things in order in Ægypt, he began to travel after Godhead, towards Jupiter Hammon, so foolish had Prosperity made him. He was to pass over the dangerous and dry Sands, where, when the Water which he brought on his Camels back was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shower of Rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extream despair. All men that know Ægypt, and have written thereof, affirm, That it never rains there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to pass what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast Deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Army; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast back, guided them over those pathless Sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Curt. l. 4.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus, says, That he was led by two Dragons, both which reports may be alike true; but many of these Wonders and things Prodigious, are feigned by those that have written the Story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his Head at the Battel of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his Head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him, at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the Treason of Æropus, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the Iron bars of which the Tyrians made their defensive Engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of Bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loaf of Bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a turf of Earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the Air. The Spaniards in the Conquest of the West-Indies have many such pretty Tales; telling how they have been assisted in Battel, by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white Horses, with the like Romish Miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest things that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the Night before the Battel at Navarra, all the Doggs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the Morning following, Trivulzi and Tremoville, Generals for Lewis the Twelfth, were by these Imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

Arrian. l. 4.

The place of this Idol of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Ægypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent, and on the North he joyns it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoils of Ship-wrack; whereas the

Temple

Temple or Grove of this Idol hath no Sea near it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Prol. Af. Tab. 3.

When Alexander came near the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things agreeable to his mad Ambition, who affected the Title of Jupiter's Son. And so he was saluted Son of Jupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek Tongue; for whereas he meant to say Opaidion, he said Opaidias; that is, O Son of Jupiter, instead of, O dear Son: for which Grammatical error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle; The one, when he was employed against Gorgon; The other, against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing these men had derived themselves from the Gods, why might not he? By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the World fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son. Curt. l. 4.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boss carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who lived, saith St. Augustine, in Moses's time,) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere non sunt nimium curiosè pervestiganda; We must not over-curiously search into the Fables which the Ancients have written of their Gods.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be preached in the World, the Devil in this and in all other Idols became speechless. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found near his Temple a Fountain, called Fons Solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Midnight is as hot as boiling Water, and at Noon as cold as any Ice, to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like Nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Baths in England are much warmer in the Night, than in the Day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike understanding that he affected the Title of Jupiter's Son, told him, that God was the Father-King of all men in general; and refining the Pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all Mortal men, but that he acknowledged none for his Children save good men.

He gave the charge of the several Provinces of Ægypt to several Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the Government of Ægypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the Estate of Ægypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy Victory would readily have redeemed;) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage, though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance pass'd it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftness thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it self tells us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, otherwise than by joyning their Hands and enterlacing their Arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Channel was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were enforc'd to lift their Bows and Arrows and Darts over their heads, to keep them from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly said of Homer, Arist. Pol. l. 5. Curt. l. 4.

VI.

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumque Deorumque.

The minds of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World by the surfeit of mis-government have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortal Diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Fever, and thereby become frantick and without understanding, fore-shewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians, followed with certain Companies of Horsemen, as if with uneven Forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude far exceeding them he forsook the advantage, which no valour of his Enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearful and cowardly men do ever follow those ways and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true, that he set all Provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsel is fruitless when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with Carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This,

Mazeus

Mazeus might have done ſome days before at good leiſure; or at this time with ſo great a ſtrength of Horſe-men, as the Macedonians durſt not have purſued them, leaving the ſtrength of their Foot out of ſight, and far behind.

The new proviſions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battel of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexander's firſt return out of Ægypt, had aſſembled all the Forces, which thoſe Regions next him could furniſh, and now alſo were the Arrians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (ſaith Curtius) that rather ſerved to make up the names of men, than to make reſiſtance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders, and finds of Foot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of Horſe four hundred thouſand, beſides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius, who muſters the Army of Darius at two hundred thouſand Foot, and near fifty thouſand Horſe, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet ſeeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or four hundred thouſand, with which he hoped in thoſe fair Plains of Aſſyria to have over-born the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philoſophy of the War.

Viget. In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium ſolent præſtare victoriam; In every Battel skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave reſt to his Army after their paſſage over Tigris, there happened an Eclipſe of the Moon, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cauſe and reaſon, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude always are) took it for a certain preſage of their overthrow and deſtruction, in ſo much as they began not only to murmur, but to ſpeak it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that diſdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they ſhould all periſh; For he not only enforc'd them to make War againſt worlds of Enemies, but againſt Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themſelves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt; and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Ægyptian Aſtrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be aſſured that this defection of the Moon was a certain preſage of good ſucceſs; for that it was natural they never imparted to the common People, but reſerved the knowledge to themſelves, ſo as a ſorry Almanack-maker had been no ſmall Fool in thoſe days.

Of this kind of ſuperſtitious obſervation Cæſar made good uſe, when he fought againſt Arioviſtus and the Germans: for they being perſwaded by the caſting of Lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they ſhould certainly loſe the Battel, Cæſar forc'd them to abide it, though they durſt not give it; wherein having their minds already beaten by their own ſuperſtition, and being reſolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect periſhed.

Theſe Ægyptians gave no other reaſon than this, That the Græcians were under the aſpect of the Sun, the Perſians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the ſtate of Perſia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obſcured. This judgment of the Ægyptian Prieſts being noiſed through all the Army, all were ſatisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though deviſed ſince, was well obſerved then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight, when it is poſſeſſed with matter of terror.

It is truly obſerved by Curtius, that the People are led by nothing ſo much as by ſuperſtition; yea, we find it in all Stories, and often in our own, that by ſuch Inventions, deviſed Tales, Dreams, and Propheſies, the People of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous Tumults and Inſurrections, and ſtill to their own loſs and ruine.

As Alexander drew near the Perſian Army, certain Letters were ſurpriſed written by Darius to the Græcians, perſwading them for great ſums of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But theſe by the advice of Parmenio he ſuppreſſed.

At this time alſo Darius his fair Wife, oppreſs'd with ſorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander ſeemed no leſs to bewail than Darius, who upon the firſt brute ſuſpected that ſome diſhonourable violence had been offered her, but being ſatisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's Kingly reſpect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he deſired the Immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Maſter of the Perſian Empire, then it would pleaſe them to confer it on ſo juſt and continent an Enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again, before the laſt tryal by Battel, offered theſe Conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in Marriage he would deliver up and reſign all Aſia the Leſs, and with Ægypt, all thoſe Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the Ranſom of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirty thouſand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his Son Ochus in hoſtage: To this they ſought to perſwade Alexander by ſuch Arguments as they had. Alexander cauſing the Embaſſadors to be removed, adviſed with his Council, but heard no man ſpeak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perſwaded him to accept of theſe fair Conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Helleſpont was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Perſian Priſoners was a great cumber, and the Treaſure offered for them of far better uſe than their Perſons, with divers other Arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his Ambition within thoſe limits, he might have lived as famous for Vertue as for Fortune, and left himſelf a Succeſſor of able Age to have enjoyed his Eſtate, which afterward, indeed, he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himſelf: who to aſſure themſelves of what they had uſurped upon his Iſſues, left not one of them to draw breath in the World within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going ſo far into the Eaſt, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a juſt and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, adviſed, and grateful: and being taught new leſſons by abundance of Proſperity, became a lover of Wine, of his own Flattery, and of extream Cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obſerved, the taint of one unjuſt ſlaughter, amongſt many, defaced and withered the flouriſhing beauty of all his great Acts and glorious Victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural Clemency and Magnanimity, without all respect to their Master; that thanks to an Enemy was improper; that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; Not against Women and Children, but against armed Enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great sums of Money to perswade his Friends to attempt upon his Person, he had reason to doubt that the Peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithful) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the War against him, not as a King with Royal and overt force, but as a Traytor by secret and base practice: That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdoms as yet in Darius's possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the Battel which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

Victories

The Battel of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

With this answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he never yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by Night; so that the multitude of Enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdains to steal the Victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witness his Valour. But it was the success that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsel given by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and entrenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of surprise had stood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night; Alexander gave his men rest and store of Food, for Reason had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse; these belike were of the Europæan Army; for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Ægyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short Speech to his Souldiers to encourage them, and I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former Battels upon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & adversarios aufert; One Victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from such as have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this Battel, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the Victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left Wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his Carriages lost; That for the first and valourous encounters on both sides, Fortune her self was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But, in conclusion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible days work; saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas, and others of name, were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number slain; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius,) thirty thousand, according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we believe Diodor. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these four or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the Field by Darius, every man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as six or seven hundred men in three notorious Battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other Weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have pass'd that River so easily, much less the River of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the Battel of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same Night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoil and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with Treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great mass of Treasure and Princely Ornaments, was rendred unto him: for for the fear which conducted Darius took nothing with it but ſhame and diſhonour. He that had been twice beaten, ſhould rather have ſent his Treaſure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, ſo near the place where he abid the coming of his Enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leiſure; but being overcome, he knew it impoſſible to drive Mules and Camels laden with Gold from the purſuing Enemy, ſeeing himſelf, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, caſt the Crown from his Head to run away with the more ſpeed. But errors are then beſt diſcerned when moſt incurable. Et præterita magis reprehendi poſſunt quam corrigi; It is eaſier to reprehend than amend what is paſt.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had moſt confidence, rendred himſelf, his Children, and the City. Alſo the Captain of the Caſtle, who was keeper of the Treaſure, ſtrewed the Streets with Flowers, burnt Frankincenſe upon Altars of Silver as Alexander paſſed by, and delivered unto him whatſoever was committed to his truſt. The Magi (the Chaldean Aſtrologers) followed this Captain in great Solemnity to entertain their new King: after theſe came the Babylonian Horſe-men, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between theſe (though not greatly to be feared) and himſelf, Alexander cauſed his Macedonian Foot-men to march. When he entred the Caſtle he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of Treaſure therein found, amounting to fifty thouſand Talents of Silver uncoined. The City it ſelf I have elſe-where deſcribed, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates, and the Circuit, with the wonderful place of Pleaſure about two miles in circuit, ſurrounded with a Wall of four-ſcore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautiful and fruitful Trees, which it is ſaid that one of the Kings of Babylon cauſed to be built, that the Queen and other Princeſſes might walk privately therein. In An. b. Alex. this City, rich in all things, but moſt of all in Voluptuous pleaſures, the King reſted himſelf and the whole Army four and thirty days, conſuming that time in banqueting, and in all ſorts of effeminate exerciſe, which ſo much ſoftened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the ſevere diſcipline of War which taught them the ſufferances of Hunger and Thirſt, of painful Travel, and hard Lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that thoſe bands of a thouſand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were ſtiled Chiliarchi. This new Order Alexander brought in, was to honour thoſe Captains which were found by certain ſelected Judges to have deſerved beſt in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian Compunies conſiſted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter Age hath been the cauſe (ſaith the Marſhal Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been beſtowed on every Picque Bœuf or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captains of Foot had a thouſand Souldiers under one Enſign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the firſt, the Title was honourable, and the Kings were leſs charged, and far better ſerved. King Henry the Eighth of England never gave the Commandment of any of his good Ships, but to men of known Valour, and of great Eſtate; nay, ſometimes he made two Gentlemen of Quality Commanders in one Ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great ſupply out of Europe, for Antipater ſent him ſix thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe; out of Macedon, of Thracians three thouſand Foot, and the like number of Horſe; and out of Greece four thouſand Foot, and four hundred Horſe; by which his Army was greatly ſtrengthened: for thoſe that were infected with the pleaſures of Babylon could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pur dormir ſur la dure; To change from ſoft beds to hard boards.

He left the Caſtle and City of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Mineus, and Apolidorus; to ſupply all wants a thouſand Talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the City unto him, he gave him the Title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagiſtines that gave up the Caſtle, and having diſtributed to every Souldier a part of the Treaſure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Suſa in Perſia, the ſame which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, ſituate on the River Eulæus, a City ſometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites alſo, Governour of this famous City, gave it up to the Conquerour with fifty thouſand Talents of Silver in Bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the Treaſures of Darius. In this ſort did thoſe Vaſſals of Fortune, lovers of the Kings Proſperity, not of his Perſon (for ſo all ambitious men are) purchaſe their own Peace and Safety with the Kings Treaſures. And herein was Alexander well adviſed, that whatſoever Titles he gave to the Perſians, yet he left all places of Importance in truſt with his own Captains; to wit, Babylon, Suſa, and Perſepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one Battel, all the Nobility of Perſia would have returned to their natural Lord. Thoſe that are Traytors to their own Kings, are never to be uſed alone in great Enterpriſes by thoſe Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be truſted with the defences of any Frontier-Town, or Fortreſs of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their Liberty and Eſtates loſt. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Petro de Navarra, being baniſhed out of Spain, was truſted with Fonterabe, in the Year 1523.

Diodor ſpeaketh of more than forty thouſand Talents in bullion, & of nine Millions of Gold, ſo durics formæ exſp.

While Alexander ſpoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furniſh'd the King from Babylon, and while he ſtaid four and thirty days at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Suſa: and while he feaſted there, Tiridates from Perſepolis might have relieved him, for the great maſs of Treaſure was laid up in that City. But who hath ſought out and friended fearful Adverſity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honeſt: for thoſe that are but greedy of themſelves, do in all changes of Fortune only conſult the conſervation of their own greatneſs.

The Government of Suſa, with the Caſtle and Treaſure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendred it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them Titles, but neither truſt nor power; for he left three thouſand old Souldiers in Garriſon to aſſure the place, and Darius's Mother and her Children to repoſe themſelves.

It is ſaid, that Charles the Fifth having promiſed Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marſeilles, if he could have forc'd it, and whereof he made ſure account, told ſome of his neareſt Counſellers, that he meant nothing leſs than the performance of that promiſe, becauſe he ſhould thereby have left left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithal to have recovered his favour.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to pass those Mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pylæ Persidis, or Susæidæ; and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being enforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515. find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius, (Justine numbers them but at eight hundred) having been taken Prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the Barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Ears, and other Members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new Garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the People to spoil the Kings Treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexander's arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Counsel, for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoil and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the World at that time, which, if it had been laid in balance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon, indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoil that had been made of Money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand Talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal Honour to the Traytor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a Creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty days, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand Horse, and certain Troups of chosen Foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered, a fruitless and foolish enterprise; but as Seneca says: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare; He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extream Frost, and make way, but with extream difficulty, through the Snow, that Alexander forsook his Horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their wearines that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink did quench their thirst, that could less endure it. For mine own little judgment I shall rather commend that Captain, that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extream necessity, than those witless arrogant Fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of Victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admiral of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his Vertues, complain, that the opinion of his Valour, of his Liberality, of his Clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carrowsing Cups all the reputation of his actions past; and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with Wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and City of Persepolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the Arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alienate their hearts: For they might well believe that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing less than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Fere vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkenness: For so it fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

Curt. l. 5.

Sen. Epist. 84.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his Death.

ABout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's coming on, with whom (trusting to such Companies as he had, which was numbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his Fortune. He thereupon calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good success, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest Men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the Ice, and proteſting that he could never be beaten by any adverſity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the reſt were of the ſame diſpoſition (whereof they likewiſe aſſured Darius by the like proteſtation) he approved the Kings reſolution. Two only, and thoſe the greateſt, to wit, Naburzanes and Beſſus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conſpired againſt their Maſter, and therefore adviſed the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and to purſue it by ſome ſuch Perſon for the preſent, againſt whom neither the Gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themſelves to be an Enemy: this preamble Naburzanes uſed, and in concluſion adviſed the election of his fellow-Traytor Beſſus, with promiſe that, the Wars ended, the Empire ſhould again be reſtored to Darius. The King, ſwollen with diſdain, preſs'd towards Naburzanes to have ſlain him, but Beſſus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the reſt, with-held him. In the mean while Naburzanes withdrew himſelf, and Beſſus followed him, making their Quarter apart from the reſt of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithful Servant, perſwaded him to be adviſed, and ſerve the time, ſeeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at laſt make ſhew of forgetting the offence made, which the King, being of a gentle diſpoſition, willingly yielded unto. Beſſus makes his ſubmiſſion, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thouſand Greeks, which had in all the former Battels ſerved Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in ſpight of the Macedonians, offered himſelf to guard his Perſon, proteſting againſt the Treaſon of Beſſus, but it was not in his deſtiny to follow their Advice, who from the beginning of the War gave him faithful Counſel; but he inclined ſtill to Beſſus, who told him, that the Greeks with Patron their Captain were corrupted by Alexander, and practiſed the diviſion of his faithful Servants. Beſſus had drawn unto him thirty thouſand of the Army, promiſing them all thoſe things, by which the lovers of the World and themſelves, are wont to be allured, to wit, Riches, Safety, and Honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly diſcovered the purpoſes of Beſſus, and being overcome with Paſſion, as thinking himſelf unable to make head againſt theſe ungrateful and unnatural Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithful Servant to depart from him, and to provide for himſelf. In like ſort he diſcharged the reſt of his attendants, all ſave a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him. His Perſians being moſt baſe Cowards, durſt not undertake his defence againſt the Bactrians, notwithſtanding that they had four thouſand Greeks to joyn with them, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forſakes himſelf, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like and King-like, to have died in the head of thoſe four thouſand Greeks, which offered him the diſpoſition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perſwaded him) than to have lien bewailing himſelf on the ground, and ſuffering himſelf to be bound like a Slave by thoſe ambitious Monſters that laid hand on him, whom neither the conſideration of his former great Eſtate, nor the honours he had given them, nor the truſt repoſed in them, nor the world of benefits beſtowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his preſent adverſity, which above all things ſhould have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungrateful hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it, for infidelity hath no compaſſion.

Now Darius, thus forſaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beaſts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be diſcovered; and to add deſpight and deriſion to his adverſity, they faſtened him with Chains of Gold, and ſo drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Beſſus and Nabarzanes perſwaded themſelves to redeem their Lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a Priſoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themſelves Kings by his ſlaughter, and then to defend themſelves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it was againſt the nature of God, who is moſt juſt, to pardon ſo ſtrange Villany, yea, though againſt a Prince purely Heatheniſh, and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durſt not abide his coming, haſted after him with a violent ſpeed, and becauſe he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horſe-back certain ſelected Companies of them, and beſt armed, and with ſix thouſand other Horſe, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treaſon of Beſſus, and ſecretly forſook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beſſus took, and how near he was at hand; for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being diſcovered by Beſſus his Rear, Beſſus brought a Horſe to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perſwading him to mount thereon, and to ſave himſelf. But the unfortunate King refuſing to follow thoſe that had betrayed him, they caſt Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beaſts that drew him, and ſlew two poor Servants that attended his Perſon. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the reſt to the mercy of the Macedonian Swords.

Polyſtratus a Macedonian, being by purſuit of the vanquiſhed preſs'd with thirſt, as he was refreſhing himſelf with ſome Water that he had diſcovered, eſpying a Cart with a Team of wounded Beaſts breathing for life, and not able to move, ſearched the ſame, and therein found Darius bathing in his own bloud. And by a Perſian Captive which followed this Polyſtratus, he underſtood that it was Darius, and was informed of this Barbarous Tragedy; Darius alſo ſeemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he caſt not out his laſt ſorrows unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on thoſe Traytors, which had dealt no leſs unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this Meſſenger, which he beſought him to purſue, not becauſe Darius had deſired it, but for his own Honour and for the ſafety of all that did, or ſhould after wear Crowns. He alſo, having nothing elſe to preſent, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace uſed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, deſiring the immortal Gods to ſubmit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus ſpeaking, impatient Death preſſing out his few remaining ſpirits, he deſired Water, which Polyſtratus preſented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the beſt things that the World had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his laſt breath, wherewith to deſire the Gods to reward his Compaſſion.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their Travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded Earth sufficed not his boundless ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East; but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruel Traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the Fruits of all their former Travels. In conclusion, he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of Foot, and Amyntas with six thousand Horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred Furlongs, it then riseth again and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zeudracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen days, banqueting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their Places and Governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their Pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bessus to Murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris, Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons have been, and are.

HEre it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her suit was (which she easily obtained) That she might accompany him till she were made with Child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeed, the Letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his Books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his Voyage, was laugh'd at by the King for inserting such News of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himself had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his Acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the Book, and threw it into the River of Indus, saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such Fables disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers touching these Warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no, there were any such kind of People. Julius Solinus seats them in the North parts of Asia the Less. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodoon; the other, near the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the People call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath Commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land Northwards, near the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us; where they governed a People called the Pandeans, or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely, perhaps as a Poet) thus.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea near Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Scythians call Æorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the Less, sack'd Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon and Aventinus report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the Siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the Wars they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the Life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa, Queen of the Amazons, by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus, though some affirm, That Theseus himself got her by stealth when she came to visit him aboard his Ship.

But in ſubſtance there is little difference; all confeſſing, That ſuch Amazons there were. The ſame Author in the Life of Pompey, ſpeaks of certain Companies of the Amazons, that came to aid the Albanians againſt the Romans, by whom, after the Battel, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he ſaith farther, That theſe Women entertain the Gelæ and Lelages once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

Hiſtor. Ind. part 2. c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the Navigation of Orellana, which he made down the River of Amazons from Peru, in the Year 1542. (upon which River, for the divers turnings, he is ſaid to have ſailed ſix thouſand miles) reports from the relation of the ſaid Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That he both ſaw thoſe Women, and fought with them, where they ſought to impeach his paſſage towards the Eaſt Sea.

It is alſo reported by Ulricus Schmidel, that in the Year 1542. where he ſailed up the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherues, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ernando Rieffere, a Crown of Silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in thoſe parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his deſcription of the Kingdom of Congo, makes relation of ſuch Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right Breaſt, and live apart from Men, ſave at one time of the year, when they Feaſt and accompany them for one Moneth. Theſe (ſaith he) poſſeſs a part of the Kingdom of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the Line: and that theſe Women are the ſtrongeſt Guards of this Emperour, all the Eaſt-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced theſe Authorities, in part, to juſtifie mine own relation of theſe Amazons, becauſe that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Caſicque of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (ſince the Spaniſh diſcoveries called Amazons) that theſe Women ſtill live and govern, was held for a vain and unprofitable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Perſian's Luxury: and how he further purſued Beſſus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Perſepolis: ſo at this time his Proſperity had ſo much over-wrought his Vertue, as he accounted clemency to be but baſeneſs, and the temperance which he had uſed all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the inſtructers of his Youth, than the condition and ſtate of ſo mighty a King, as the World could not equal. For he perſwaded himſelf that he now repreſented the greatneſs of the Gods; he was pleaſed that thoſe that came before him, ſhould fall to the ground and adore him; he ware the Robes and Garments of the Perſians, and commanded that his Nobility ſhould do the like; he entertained in his Court, and Camp, the ſame ſhameleſs rabble of Curtiſans, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and deteſted manners of the Perſians, whom he had vanquiſhed. So licentious is Felicity, as notwithſtanding that he was fully perſwaded that the Gods, whom he ſerved (deteſting the vices of the invaded) aſſiſted him in all attempts againſt them, he himſelf, contrary to the Religion he profeſs'd (which how Idolatrous ſoever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by Ignorance or Education, a more foul and fearful Monſter than Darius, from whoſe Tyranny he vaunted to have delivered ſo many Nations. Yea, thoſe that were deareſt and neareſt unto him, began to be aſhamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like ſcornful diſcourſe, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of ſo many Travels more impoveriſhed in their Vertues, than enriched by their Victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerours, or the conquered were the baſer Slaves. Neither were theſe opinions ſo reſerved, but that the noiſe of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts ſought to pacifie the better ſort, and thoſe of whoſe judgments he was moſt jealous; and making it known to the Army that Beſſus had aſſumed the Title of a King, and called himſelf Artaxerxes; and that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had Arguments enough to perſwade them to go on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themſelves (ſo far engaged) be caſt away. And becauſe they were peſtered with the ſpoils of ſo many Cities, as the whole Army ſeemed but the guard of their Carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans Fardels to be brought into the Market-place, he together with his own, cauſed all to be conſumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved moſt dangerous unto him, ſeeing the common Souldiers had more intereſt in theſe things, which they had bought with their painful Travels, and with their Bloud, than in the Kings Ambition; had not (as Seneca often obſerved) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, news came to him that Satribarzanes, whom he had eſtabliſhed in his former Government over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he ſought him out, but the Rebel hearing of his coming, fled to Beſſus with two thouſand Horſe. He then went on towards Beſſus, and by ſetting a great pile of Wood on fire with the advantage of a ſtrong Wind, won a paſſage over a high and unacceſſable Rock, which was defended againſt him with thirteen thouſand Foot. For the extremity of the flame and ſmoke forced them from the place, otherwiſe Invincible. I ſaw in the third Civil War of France certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any Ladder or Engine, till at laſt by certain bundles of Straw let down by an Iron Chain, and a weighty ſtone in the midſt, thoſe that defended it were ſo ſmothered, as they rendred themſelves with their Plate, Money, and other Goods therein hidden. There were alſo, ſome three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, ſmothered to death, together with their Horſes, by the Country People, who did ſet the long dry Graſs on fire to the Eaſtward of them, (the Wind in thoſe parts being always Eaſt) ſo as notwithſtanding their flying from the ſmoke, there was not any one that eſcaped. Sir John Borrowes alſo, with an hundred Engliſh, was in great danger of being loſt at Margarita, in the Weſt-Indies, by having the Graſs fired behind him, but the ſmoke being timely diſcovered, he recovered the Sea-

ſhore with the loſs of ſixteen of his men. I remember theſe things, but to give caution to thoſe that ſhall in times to come invade any part of thoſe Countries, that they always, before they paſs into the Land, burn down the Graſs and Sedge to the Eaſt of them; they may otherwiſe, without any other Enemy than a handful of Straw ſet on fire, die the death of Hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conſpiracy againſt Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where reſiſted, till he came into Aria, to the Eaſt of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended againſt him, by the revolt of Sartibarzanes, but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new ſupply of five thouſand and five hundred Foot, and near five hundred Horſe, out of Greece, Theſſaly, and other places. His Journey out of Perſia into theſe parts is very confuſedly deſcribed. For having (as all his Hiſtorians tell us) a determination to find Beſſus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northward towards the obſcure Mardi, upon the Caſpian-Sea, and thence over the Mountains Coronus into Aria and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the Treaſon of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the Son of Parmenio was accuſed, as acceſſary, if not principal. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conſpired with ſome others againſt the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the ſame Treaſon. The Youth, although he was firſt bound by Oath to ſecrecy, when he heard ſo foul a matter uttered, began to proteſt againſt it ſo vehemently, that his Friend was like to have ſlain him for ſecurity of his own Life. So conſtrained by fear, he made ſhew as if he had been won by perſwaſion, and by ſeeming at length to like well of the buſineſs, he was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of Rank; whoſe Names Dimnus (to countenance the enterpriſe) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no ſooner freed himſelf from the company of this Traytor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own Brother Ceballinus with the whole Hiſtory: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with leaſt ſuſpicion) ſhould go to the Court and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole buſineſs, deſiring him to acquaint the King therewith; which he promiſed to do, but did not. Two days paſſed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter; but ſtill excuſed himſelf to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leiſure. This his coldneſs bred ſuſpicion, and cauſed Ceballinus to addreſs himſelf to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forth-with brought him to Alexander's preſence. Alexander, finding by examination what had paſſed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perſwade himſelf that this concealment of the Treaſon, argued his hand to have been in the buſineſs. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traytor no other queſtion than this: Wherein have I ſo offended thee, that thou ſhouldeſt think Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiving, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had ſo wounded himſelf, that he lived no longer than to give his laſt groan in the Kings preſence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the ſuſpicion which his ſilence might juſtly breed. His anſwer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious ſervices of his Father Parmenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himſelf, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for aſſurance; yet by the inſtigation of Craterus, he again ſwallowed his Princely promiſe, and made his Enemies his Judges: Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this buſineſs; How he perſwaded himſelf, that he could never find a better occaſion to oppreſs his private Enemy, than by pretending Piety and Duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better as it is more general in his Philotas.

See how theſe great men cloath their private hate,
In theſe fair colours of the publick good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection ſtood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealouſies,
Will put the leaſt conceit of diſcontent
Into the greateſt rank of Treacheries,
That no one action ſhall ſeem innocent;
Yea, Valour, Honour, Bounty, ſhall be made
As acceſſaries unto ends unjuſt:
And even the ſervice of the State muſt lade
The needfull'ſt undertaking with diſtruſt,
So that baſe vileneſs, idle Luxury,
Seem ſafer far, than to do worthily, &c.

Now although it were ſo that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had reſolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very Evening of the ſame Night in which he was Apprehended, he called him to a Banquet, and diſcourſed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the Night Philotas was taken in his Lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in theſe words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath ſurmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more conſtant than the word of a King. Many circumſtances were urged againſt him by Alexander himſelf; (for the Kings of Macedon did in Perſon examine the accuſations of Treaſon) and this was not the leaſt (not the leaſt offence, indeed, againſt the Kings humour, who deſired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the Title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He anſwered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that ſacred Fellowſhip of the Gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for thoſe that ſhould live under ſuch a one as would exceed the nature of Man. This was (ſaith Alexander) a firm perſwaſion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in deſpight. See what a ſtrange Monſter Flattery is, that can perſwade Kings to kill thoſe that do not praiſe and allow thoſe things in them, which are of all other moſt to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration againſt him: he was brought forth in vile Garments, and bound like a Thief; where he heard himſelf, and his abſent Father, the greateſt Captain of the World, accuſed, his two other Brothers, Hector and Nicanor having been loſt in in the preſent War. He was ſo greatly oppreſt with grief as for a while he could utter nothing but Tears, and ſorrow had ſo waſted his ſpirits, as he ſunk under thoſe that led him. In the end the King asked him in what Language he would make his Defence; he anſwered, in the ſame wherein it had pleaſed the King to accuſe him, which he did to the end that the Perſians, as well as the Macedonians, might underſtand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perſwading the Aſſembly that he diſdained the Language of his own Country, and ſo withdrawing himſelf, left him to his mercileſs Enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, ſeeing the King who had ſo ſharply inveighed againſt him, would not vouchſafe to hear his excuſe. For, not his Enemies only were imboldened thereby againſt him, but all the reſt having diſcovered the Kings diſpoſition and reſolution, contended among themſelves which of them ſhould exceed in hatred towards him; among many other Arguments which he uſed in his own defence, this was not the weakeſt, That when Nicomachus deſired to know of Dimnus what men of mark and power were his Partners in the Conſpiracy (as ſeeming unwilling to adventure himſelf with mean and baſe Companions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and ſome others, but ſpake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horſe, would greatly have valued the Party, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas ſaid well for himſelf, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any ſuch practice. And for more certain proof that he knew nothing of their intents, that practiſed againſt the King, there was not any one of the Conſpirators, being many, inforc'd by Torments or otherwiſe that could accuſe him, and it is true, that adverſity being ſeldom able to bear her own burden, is for the moſt part found ſo malicious, as ſhe rather deſires to draw others (not always deſerving it) into the ſame danger, than to ſpare any that it can accuſe. Yet at the laſt, howſoever it were, to avoid the extremity of reſiſtleſs and unnatural Torments, deviſed by his profeſt Enemies, Craterus, Cenus, Epheſtion, and others, Philotas accuſed his own ſelf; being perſwaded that they would have ſlain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miſerable hope, and ſuffering all that could be laid on Fleſh and Blood, he was forc'd to deliver, not what he knew, but whatſoever beſt pleaſed their ears, that were far more mercileſs than death it ſelf.

Of this kind of judicial proceeding St. Auguſtin greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, ſaith he, with Fountains of tears. Quid cum in ſua cauſa quiſque torquetur: & cum quæritur utrum ſit nocens cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto ſcelere certiſſimas pœnas: non quia illud commiſiſſe detegitur, ſed quia non commiſiſſe neſcitur; What ſhall we ſay to it, when one is put to torture in his own Caſe; and tormented whileſt yet it is in queſtion whether he be guilty; and being innocent, ſuffers aſſured puniſhment for a fault of which there is no certainty, not becauſe he is known to have committed the Offence, but becauſe other do not know that he hath not committed it.

Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 19. c. 6.

It had been enough for Alexanders ſafety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the reſt would not much have grieved thereat, becauſe he was greatly ſuſpected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conſpired againſt him, made the Kings Cruelty and delight in Blood the greateſt motive of his own ill intent. Therefore Seneca ſpeaking of Alexander, ſaith thus: Crudelitas nimine humanum malum eſt, indignum tam miti animo; ferina iſta rabies eſt ſanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine, in ſilveſtre animal tranſire; Cruelty is not a humane Vice; it is unworthy of ſo mild a Spirit. It is even a beaſtly Rage to delight in Blood and Wounds, and caſting away the nature of Man to become a ſavage Monſter.

Sen. de Clem. l. 1.

For the concluſion of this Tragedy, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the Confeſſion that Philotas made, were to give end to the Torments which he could not any longer indure, or that the ſame was true indeed; For (ſaith he) in this caſe, they that ſpeak truly, or they that deny falſly, come to one and the ſame end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lynceſtes, Son-in-law to Antipater, who had been three years in Priſon, ſhould be ſlain: The ſame diſpatch had all thoſe that Nicomachus had accuſed: others there were that were ſuſpected, becauſe they had followed Philotas, but when they had anſwered for themſelves, that they knew no way ſo direct to win the Kings Favour, as by loving thoſe whom the King favoured, they were diſmiſt. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had ſerved with great fidelity, as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himſelf; Parmenio that firſt opened the way into Aſia; That had depreſt Attalus the Kings Enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leſs prudent in counſel, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the Men of War, and to ſay the truth, he that had made the purchaſe for the King of the Empire of the Eaſt, and of all the Glory and Fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the Death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have diſhonoured his Fidelity in his eldeſt Age, having now lived threeſcore and ten years) yet upon thoſe that by the witchcraft of flattery had poſſeſt themſelves of his Affection; it was reſolved that he ſhould be diſpatcht. Polydamus was imployed in this buſineſs, a man whom of all other Parmenio truſted moſt, and loved beſt, who (to be ſhort) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other Murtherers with him, ſlew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings Letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domique clari viri; Multa ſine Rege proſperè, Rex ſine illo nihil magnæ rei geſſerat; This was the end of Parmenio (ſaith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praiſe.

Lib. 7.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander ſubdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other People. How Beſſus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen theſe things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araſpians or Evergitans; he made Amenides (ſometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour; then he ſubdued the Arachoſians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, ſometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, conſiſting of twelve thouſand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he paſt through ſome cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the Eaſt, where he built a City which he honoured with his own own Name, and peopled it with ſeven thouſand of his old Macedons, worn with Age, and with travails of the War. The Arians, who ſince he left them were revolted, he ſubdued again by the induſtry and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now he reſolves to find out the new King Beſſus in Bactria. Beſſus hearing of his coming, prepares to paſs over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governour of Bactria abandoned by Beſſus; the Macedonian Army ſuffereth for want of Water, inſomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had loſt in any one Battel againſt the Perſians. And it may well be; for (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought againſt Women, not againſt Men, and not againſt their Perſons, but their Shadows. He found on the Banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either Boats, Bridges, or Raff, but was forc'd to ſow together the Hides that covered his Carriages, and ſtuff them with Straw, and on them in ſix days to paſs over his Army; which Beſſus might eaſily have diſtreſt, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar off. He had formerly complained againſt Darius for neglecting to defend the Banks of Tigris, and other Paſſages. and yet now, when this traiterous Slave had ſtiled himſelf a King, he durſt not perform any thing worthy of a Slave. And therefore thoſe that were neareſt unto him, and whom he moſt truſted, to wit Spitamines, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own ſafety, and by the memory of Beſſus his Treaſon and Cruelty againſt Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Maſter, but with this difference, that he had the Chain cloſed about his neck like a Maſtiff Dog, and ſo was dragged along to be preſented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whoſe Iſſues had well-near forgotten their Country Language. Theſe moſt cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the Sword, and deſtroyed their City. At this place he received Beſſus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the reſt that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his Brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himſelf ſecure, ſome twenty thouſand Mountainers aſſaulted his Camp; in repelling whom, he received a ſhot in the Leg, the Arrow-head ſticking in the Fleſh, ſo as he was carried in a Horſe-Lytter, ſometime by the Horſemen, ſometime by the Foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Parondinus takes to be Samarchand, the Regal City of the great Tamerlain. It had in compaſs threeſcore and ten Furlongs (Curtius ſaith.) Here he received the Embaſſadors of the Scythians, (called Arians) who offered to ſerve him.

The Bactrians are ſhortly again with the Sogdians ſtirred to Rebellion by the ſame Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traitor Beſſus. Many Cities were reſolvedly defended againſt him, all which, after Victory, he defaced and raſed, killing all therein. At one of theſe he received a Blow on the Neck which ſtruck him to the ground, and much diſabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, againſt whom he imployed Menedemus with three thouſand Foot and eight hundred Horſe.

In the heat of theſe Tumults, Alexander marched on, (if we may believe Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; upon whoſe Bank he built another Alexandria threeſcore Furlongs in compaſs, which he beautified with Houſes within ſeventeen days after the Walls were built. The building of this City is ſaid to have been occaſion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perſwading himſelf, that this new Town was fortified of purpoſe to keep him under. I do not well underſtand why the Scythians, offering War in ſuch terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeit Sickneſs for very fear, ſhould nevertheleſs make ſuit for Peace: neither find I the reaſon why Alexander (not intending the Conqueſt of thoſe Northern Deſerts, but only the defence of his own Bank) ſhould refuſe to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they ſhould agree to ſuffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter, and a Victory deſcribed; in purſuit of which, the Macedons ran beyond the Bounds and Monuments of Bacchus his Expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly miſtaken this River which the call Tanais. For it was the River of Iaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander paſt over, while Menedemus was imployed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais, which divides Aſia from Europe, is near two thouſand miles diſtant from any part of Bactria or Sogdiana, and the way deſert and unknown. So that Alexander had (beſides Iaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to ſwim over, ere he could recover Tanais, which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have diſcovered with the Army that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he lived in Aſia in that Travail.

Wherefore it is enough to believe that the Aſiatick Scythians, making ſome offer to diſturb the Erection of this new City, which was like to give ſome hindrance to their excurſions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defenſive Arms, eaſily chaſed ſome ten or twelve miles, which is the ſubſtance of Curtius his Report. As for the limits of Bacchus his Journey; like enough it is that Bacchus) if in his life time he were as ſober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not very far into that waſte Country, where he could find nothing but Trees and Stones, nor other buſineſs than to ſet up a Monument.

Threeſcore of the Macedons are ſaid to have been ſlain, and one thouſand one hundred hurt in this Fight, which might eaſily be, in paſſing a great River, defended againſt them by good Archers. Of Scythian Horſes one thouſand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many Priſoners. It is forbidden by ſome Hiſtorians, and indeed it is hardly poſſible to ſet down the numbers of ſuch as periſh in Battel; yet Cæſar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been ſo inquiſitive into the greatneſs of their own ſucceſs, that Writers have been able to deliver ſuch particulars by credible report: I hold it not unlawful to ſet down what we find; eſpecially when it ſerves to give light to the buſineſs in hand. The ſmall number which the Macedonians loſt; the omiſſion of the number which they ſlew (a thing not uſual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may ſet out the greatneſs of Alexander) and the little Booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the repulſion of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Muſcovite, without any any boaſt) and therefore better omitted by ſome Hiſtorians, than ſo highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was aſſuring himſelf of thoſe Scythians bordering upon Iaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was ſlain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greateſt numbers ſlain, to wit, two thouſand Foot, and three hundred Horſe. He therefore, to appeaſe the Rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haſte he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and lays waſte all before him; not ſparing the innocent Children, and ſo departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repair this loſs, he received a great ſupply of nineteen thouſand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which and the old Army, he returns towards the South, and paſſeth the River of Oxus; on the South ſide whereof he built ſix Towns near each other for mutual ſuccour. But he finds a new ſtart-up-Rebel, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thouſand Souldiers that defended againſt him a ſtrong piece of Ground on the top of a high Hill; whom, when Alexander had fought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promiſed ten Talents to the firſt, nine to the ſecond, and ſo in proportion to the reſt, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loſs of ſome two and thirty of their Men, and then made a ſign to Alexander, that they had performed his Commandment. Hereupon he ſent one Copbes to perſwade Arimazes to yield the Place; who, being ſhewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yielded ſimply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his Kindred) ſcourged and crucified to death; which Puniſhment they well deſerved for neglecting to keep good Watch in ſo dangerous a time. For the Place, as ſeems by the deſcription, might eaſily have been defended againſt all the Armies of the World. But what ſtrength cannot do, mans Wit, being the moſt forcible Engine, hath often effected; of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Iſland of Sarke, joyning to Garnſey, and of that Government, was in Queen Maries time ſurpriſed by the French, and could never have been recovered again by ſtrong hand, having Cattel and Corn enough upon the Place to feed ſo many men as will ſerve to defend it, and being every way ſo inacceſſible that it might be held againſt the Great Turk. Yet by the induſtry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this ſort regained. He anchored in the Road with one Ship of ſmall Burden, and pretending the Death of his Merchant, beſought the French, being ſome thirty in number, that they might bury their Merchant in hallowed ground, and in the Chappel of that Iſle; offering a Preſent to the French of ſuch Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they ſhould not come aſhore with any Weapon, no not ſo much as with a Knife) the French men yielded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead Carkaſs, but with Swords, Targets and Harquebuſſes. The French received them at their landing, and ſearching every of them ſo narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; ſome part of the French took the Flemiſh Boat and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the Commodities promiſed, and what elſe they pleaſed, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappel, ſhut the door to them, and taking their Weapons out of the Coffin ſet upon the French; they run to the Cliff and cry to their Company aboard the Flemings to come to their Succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings yielded themſelves and the Place. Thus a Fox Tail doth ſometimes help well to peece out the Lyons Skin, that elſe would be too ſhort.

§. XIX.

How Alexander ſlew his own Friends.

After theſe Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexanders killing of a Lyon, and other frivolous matter, and that he committed the government of Maracanda, and the Country about it to Clytus, and how he ſlew him ſoon after, for valuing the Vertue of Philip the Father before that of Alexander the Son, or rather becauſe he objected to the King the Death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon, for therein he toucht him to the quick, the ſame being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed had deſerved as much at the Kings hands as any man living had done, and had in particular ſaved his Life, which the King well remembred when he came to himſelf, and when it was too late. Yet to ſay the truth, Clytus his Inſolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, ſo the King in his (for neither of them were themſelves) forgat whom he went about to ſlay, for the grief whereof, he tore his own Face and ſorrowed ſo inordinately, as, but for the perſwaſions of Caliſthenes, it is thought he would have ſlain himſelf.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of repentance; but preceding Miſchiefs are not amended by ſucceeding Bewailings. Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obſtantem malis conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi poſſedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, ſed protrahit. Drunkenneſs both kindles and lays open every Vice; it removes out of the way that ſhame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where Wine gets the Maſtery, all the Ill that before lay hidden breaks out: Drunkenneſs indeed rather diſcovers Vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who ſlew Beſſus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murthered by his Wife, and his Head preſented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans alſo ſeized upon his Fellow Conſpirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all theſe petty Rebels, diſpoſed of the Provinces which he paſt over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it ſuffered ſo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he loſt in one Tempeſt a thouſand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and deſtroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who ſubmitted himſelf unto him, feaſted him greatly, and preſented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one; which although all the Macedonians diſdained, yet none of them durſt uſe any freedom of ſpeech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his courſe towards India, having ſo increaſed his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand armed men.

In

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he imployed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo, whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the Assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; that the Opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the Death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the World. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowsing Feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the Gods. Alexander stood behind a Partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings Honour, was yet soon after tormented to Death, not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable Flatterers did. For in a Conspiracy against the King, made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without Confession, Accusation, or Tryal, to be torn asunder upon the Rack: This deed, unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen æternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fælicitas redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur, & Calisthenem: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quotiens dictum erit omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoque tentavit novis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciæ usque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicetur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quàm scelus Calisthenes; This is the eternal Crime of Alexander, which no Vertue nor Felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians, it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew Calisthenes. When it shall be said, He slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said, He won all as far as to the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusual Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace to the utmost Bounds of the Orient, it shall be said withal, but he killed Calisthenes. Let him have outgone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings, none of all his Acts makes so much to his Glory, as Calisthenes to his Reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders Journey into India. The Battel between him and Porus.

With the Army before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thousand Foot and Horse, Alexander did enter the Borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa, built by Bacchus, which after a few days was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate Fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made Feasts for ten days together. Now when he had drunk his fill, he went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, Victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolemy led one part, Cenon another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleophe the Queen, to whom again he restored it; at the Siege of this City he received a Wound in the Leg. After this Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he wan also a Passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his Company, and his Head presented to Alexander. This is the sum of Alexander's doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared Boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrival, had perswaded Omphis, King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conqueror. Therefore, soon upon Alexanders coming, Omphis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and six and fifty Elephants unto him, offering him his Service and Assistance. He made Alexander know that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiasares and Porus, wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this Disunion to make his own Victory by far the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withal fourscore Talents of silver Coin, which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of Glory, not of Gold, he gave Omphis a thousand Talents of his own Treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abiasares having heard that Alexander had received his Enemy Omphis into his Protection, resolved to make his own Peace also: For knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the Chance of War gave, he thought it an ill Match when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Party and Head of the Quarrel. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a Commandment, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him Homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer, That he would satisfie him in his first Demand, which was to attend him on his Borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other Acknowledgment he was resolved to take counsel of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to pass over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own Home. Porus attends him on the farther Bank with thirty thousand Foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great Troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staid somewhat longer ere he had seen India. The River was four Furlongs broad, which makes half a Mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with Wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolomy up the River with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus, who by this device being drawn from his first incamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolomy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon meant to force their Passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther Shore without resistance. He orders his Troups, and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of Fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had pass'd it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with four thousand Horse, and a hundred armed Waggons to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the Fields were so moistned, as the Horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their Reins, and other Furniture, over-turning the Waggons and those in them. Perdiccas also gave upon the Indian Horse-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoil. Porus moves forward with the gross of his Army, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recover his Rear: Alexander, being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomy, and Perdiccas, took on him to charge the Indian Horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to brake upon Porus his battel of Foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them of the greatest stature. By these Beasts the Macedonian Foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedons, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head and ran over the Foot that followed them. In the end, and after a long and doubtful Fight, by the advantage of Weapon, and by the courage and skilfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the Victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Country People. Yet for his own Person he never gave ground otherwise than with his Sword towards his Enemies, till being weakened with many Wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a Prisoner to the Conquerour, from whom again he received his Estate with a great enlargement.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these there Travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The Magnificence and Riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Staines.

Our great Traveller Mandevile, who died in the Year 1372. and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memory of his Excelleney, saith Guicciardine.

Guic. in Disc. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the main Stream, are now possess'd by the great Mogor, the Ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all that tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a Ship of London, suffered Shipwrack in the Year 1609. and some of the Company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great City (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they endeavoured to subject unto them the Oxydracæ, a People inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with Thunder and Lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordnance that those People had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon, many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River of Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions, and that he was able to bring into the Field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this Discovery and Conquest, yet all the Art he had could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, where-with he hoped to beguile Posterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater Trenches, greater Cabins for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher Mangers than his Horses could feed in. He caused all Furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as Reliques, and wondred at by the Savages. Proportionable to these, he raised up twelve great Altars to be the Monument of his Journeys end. This was a ready way to increase the fame of his bigness; to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspicion that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acesines, and there determined to set up his Fleet where Acesines and Hydaspis encounter, where to testifie by a surer Monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities; the one he called Nicæa, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse

Buce-

Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armours, garnished with Silver and Gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted: It is then written of him, that assaulting a City of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the Wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants, tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he past down the River with his Fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a Rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrival of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He feasted these Embassadors upon a hundred Beds of Gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who soon after their dispatch returned again with a Present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each four Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their Entertainments ended, he sails towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Ægypt) was wounded, and cured by an Herb which Alexander dreamt that he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came near the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the Tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the Flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few days observed well the course of the Sea, he pas'd out of the Rivers Mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the Coast towards the Mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus, in the beginning of his sixth Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels, in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen days march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misery for want of Food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

Of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

FRom Gedrosia Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing near to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the Triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish Vice being hateful enough in it self, yet it always inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curtius) the Hangman followed the Feast, for Aspastes, one of his Provincial Governours, he commanded to be slain; so as neither did the excess of Voluptuousness qualifie his Cruelty, nor his Cruelty hinder in ought his Voluptuousness.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his return out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander and the other Chief, with six hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoycing that the lie of the King was at last executed on the Ministers of his lie.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the Coast, and made report of an Island rich in Gold, and of other strange things: whereupon they were commanded to make some farther Discovery: which done, that they should enter the Mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew near to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chelguena: where he was presented with many rich Gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch, in especial favour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certain loose Fellows to witness against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus's his Tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be slain, suspecting his greatness. Caperat (saith Curtius) esse praceps ad reprasentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda: He began headlongly to shed blood, and to believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, seeing Cruelty is more fearful than all the adventures that can be made against it.

Arrianus hath a far different description of Cyrus his Tomb.

At this time it is said that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threescore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custom of his Country, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommodity of elder age, it is uncertain: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he Married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger Sister to his beloved Ephestion, and fourscore other Persian Ladies to his Captains. There were six thousand Guests invited to the Feast, to each of which he gave a Cup of Gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young Souldiers out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the Monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and six thousand hired Souldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these Forces and Treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandment that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearful of his indignation) all submitted themselves, (except the Athenians) though they resolved that it was a manifest preparation towards their Bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the Travel of War, and to keep the reſt in Aſia. He uſed many Orations to ſatisfie them, but it was in vain during the Tempeſt of their Fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine thread, when they have tumbled a while, ſo are the unconſiderate multitude eaſily conducted when their firſt Paſſions are evaporate. With ſuch as were licenſed to depart, he ſent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantſhip of Macedon, Theſſaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his firſt departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his abſence, diſcharged the truſt committed unto him with great fidelity, and ſent him ſo many ſtrong ſupplies into Aſia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counſel of his Cups, he would have caſt ſome better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a ſtronger reaſon for his remove, than to have employed him in the conduction of a new ſupply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater ſaw nothing in this remove, but the Kings diſpoſition to ſend him after Parmenio, and the reſt. With this Antipater, the King, notwithſtanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not ſtand in doubt of every man ill-affected, though valiant; but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardineſs and underſtanding, which is many times ſo fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themſelves thereof.

After he had ſent for Antipater, he made a Journey into Media to ſettle things there; where Epheſtion, whom he favoured moſt of all men, dies. The King, according to the greatneſs of his love, laments his loſs; hangs his Phyſician, and beſtows upon his Monument twelve thouſand Talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but ſent; and not to excuſe himſelf, but to free himſelf. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gain-ſay) Antipater, by his Sons, Caſſander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexander's Cup, gave him Poiſon, Theſſalus (who was of the Conſpiracy) having invited him to a drinking Feaſt of purpoſe. For after he had taken a carouſe in Hercules his Cup, a draught of drink ſtronger than Hercules himſelf, he quitted the World within a few days.

Certainly the Princes of the World have ſeldom found good by making their Miniſters over-great, and thereby ſuſpitious to themſelves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perſwaded that Kings ought to purchaſe it from their Vaſſals, will never pleaſe himſelf with the price given. The only reſtorative, indeed, that ſtrengthens it, is the goodneſs and vertue of the Prince, and his Liberality makes it more diligent; ſo as proportion and diſtance be obſerved. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms twelve years, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than Cæſar did, after he had ſo long a time governed the Gaules, where he utterly forgot the Art of Obedience. A moſt cruel and ungrateful Traytor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared ſome ill meaſure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calliſthenes, having been ſo lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had reſolved to have given him ſome other great Government in Aſia: the old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance deſired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexander's Perſon and Qualities.

HOwſoever it were, Alexander's former cruelties cannot be excuſed, no more than his vanity to be eſteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his exceſſive delight in drink and drunkenneſs, which others make the cauſe of his Fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterpriſing, and grieved to conſider what he ſhould do when he had conquered the World, Auguſtus Cæſar found juſt cauſe to deride him, as if the well governing of ſo many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than abundant, to buſie his brains withal. That he was both learned, and a lover of Learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his firſt Book of the advancement of Learning, hath proved it ſufficiently. His Liberality I know not how to praiſe, becauſe it exceeded proportion. It is ſaid, That when he gave a whole City to one of his Servants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modeſty refuſe it, as diſproportionable to his Fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which Seneca; Animoſa vox videtur & regia, cum ſit ſtultiſſima. Nihil enim per ſe cuiquam decet. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. ſine quibus facti ratio non conſtabit, habeatur perſonarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum ſit ubique virtutis modus, æque peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit; It ſeems a brave and Royal ſpeech, whereas indeed it is very fooliſh. For nothing ſimply conſidered by it ſelf becomes a man. We muſt regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which conſiderations no act can be approved. Let Honours be proportioned unto the Perſons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by meaſure, the exceſs is as faulty as the defect. L. 2. de Ben. c. 1.

For his Perſon, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a diſpoſition taken by it ſelf, not much to be admired; For I am reſolved that he had ten thouſand in his Army as daring as himſelf. Surely, if adventrous natures were to be commended ſimply, we ſhould confound that vertue with the hardineſs of Thieves, Ruffians, and Maſtiff Doggs. For certainly it is no way praiſeworthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of thoſe lawful enterpriſes, in which we are employed for the ſervice of our Kings and Common-weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who have bought their glory with ſo great deſtruction, and effuſion of Bloud, I think him far inferiour to Cæſar, and many other that lived after him, ſeeing he never undertook any Warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was ever encountred with any Army of which he had not a moſt maſtring advantage, both of Weapons and of Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the beſt of his Enemies. But it ſeemeth, Fortune and Deſtinies (if we may uſe thoſe terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their Necks to the Yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For concluſion, we will agree with Seneca, who ſpeaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgment of them. Quod non minores fuere peſtes mortalium quam inundatio, qua planum omne perfuſum eſt, quàm conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit; That they were no leſs plagues to mankind, than an overflow of Waters, drowning all the level; or ſome burning drought, whereby a great part of living Creatures is ſcorched up. Natural. queſt. l. 3. q. 1.

Chap. III.

The Reign of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the Question about Succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only Eye. For, that which is reported in Fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance ineffectual, and harmful chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the Divine Ordinance) were, partly the uncertainty of Title to Succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborn Pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his Heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own Fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) Governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in Marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himself: Amyntas never attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the begining of his Reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole Issue of his Marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unless (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbad the Reign of Women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and so great were their Conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in balance against the demand of their Posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had Issue by none of the principal of them. Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly Married) was left by him great with Child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Bar of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexander's Children.

Cleopatra, the Sister of Alexander, Widdow to the King of Epirus, and Aridæus his base Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had Married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custom had made that Sex uncapable of the Soveraignty; Aridæus (besides his Bastardy) was neither for Person nor Quality fit to Rule as King; yet upon him the Election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Ægypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Persian brood, King Alexander's Children, was of opinion, that the Rule of all should be given to the Captains, that going for Law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the Son of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Arsinoë Ptolomy's Mother, delivered her in Marriage to Lagus, being great with Child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those dissentions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his Blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himself, which could not have come to pass had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himself; and therefore gave such counsel as fitted his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it. For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexander's empty Chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their consultations, or to set in the Chair such a King as Aridæus, no wiser than the Chair it self. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shews of dissembling aspirers, do often take check by the plain dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Aristonus, another of the Captains, interpreted the words of Alexander; saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his Ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his own purchases; and those tokens of Alexander's purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be enclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the Eſtate Royal. He was no ſtranger to the Royal Bloud; yet his Birth gave him not ſuch Reputation, as the great Favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that eſpecially ſince the Death of Epheſtion (a powerful Minion) into whoſe place he was choſen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private Valour. But very ſurly he was: which quality (joyned with good Fortune) carried a ſhew of Majeſty: being checkt with miſadventure, it was called by a true Name Pride; and rewarded with Death.

In the preſent buſineſs a fooliſh over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happineſs to have ſucceeded Alexander. For not content to have the Acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the Sentence of Ariſtonus, he would needs counterfeit Modeſty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have entreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which ſwould be the leſs envious, the more ſolemnity he uſed in the acceptance. It is truely ſaid, He that feigneth himſelf a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irreſolute Behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed againſt him. In concluſion he pronounced, that whoſoever was Heir to the Crown, the Souldiers ought to be Heirs to the Treaſure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing ſlow, to ſhare it. This diſturbed all the Conſultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any concluſion to good effect without conſent of the Souldiers, who greedy of ſpoyl thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The election of Aridæus, with the Troubles thereabout ariſing; the firſt diviſion of the Empire.

DUring this uproar, mention was made of Aridæus by ſome one, and entertained with good liking of many, until at laſt it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager having withdrawn himſelf tumultuouſly from the company of the Lords, was glad of ſo fair an occaſion to make himſelf great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers Name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inveſting him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withſtood this Election, but in vain; for they could not reſolve what courſe to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counſel which Perdiccas at firſt had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this Child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Python vain. Finally, Perdiccas with ſix hundred men, and Ptolomy with the King's Pages, took upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he liſted, eaſily brake in upon them, and inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soveraign Lord. Then by the interceſſion of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither ſide faithfully meant.

Leonatus who was of the Royal Bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, iſſued out of Babylon, being followed by all the Horſe, which conſiſted (for the moſt part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but ſtanding upon his Guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any Commotion, that ſhould happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt ſucceeded ill, being neither ſecretly carried, nor committed to ſure Executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with ſuch gravity, that they departed honeſter than they came; being ſorry of their bad Enterprize. Upon the news of this Attempt the Camp was in an uproar, which the King ſeeking to paciſie, wanted Authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courteſie. The matter it ſelf affordeth not good excuſes, and his indiſcretion made them worſe. He ſaid that no harm was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were againſt the tyrannous enterprize, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the ſureſt of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeaſed, until the King by offering to reſign his Eſtate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to ſet him up at the firſt.

Perdiccas having now joyned himſelf with Leonatus, kept the Fields, intending to cut off all proviſion of Victuals from the City. But after ſundry Embaſſies paſſing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of Sedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the King's deſire. Meleager ſhould have done well to conſider, that ſuch men as had one day demanded his Head, were not like the day following to give him a principal Place among them, without any new occaſion offered, had not ſome purpoſe of Treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love proteſted where little was intended. The face of the Court was the ſame which it had been in Alexander's time: but no longer now: did the ſame heart give it life; and windy ſpirits they were which moved in the Arteries. Falſe Reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own diſgrace, but in ſuch terms as might ſeem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himſelf; and (as deſirous of a true Friendſhip) deſired of Perdiccas, that ſuch Authors of Diſcord might be puniſhed. Perdiccas (as a lover of Peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a general Muſter ſhould be made, at which time the diſturbers of the common quiet ſhould receive their puniſhment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in preſence of the Army. The Plot was miſchievouſly laid: Had Meleager given way to ſeditious Rumours, he muſt needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a ſower of diſſention; and thereby with publick approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now ſeeking redreſs of theſe Diſorders, he haſtened his own ruine, by a leſs formal, but more ſpeedy way. This kind of Muſter was very ſolemn, and practiſed with many Ceremonies, as for cleanſing of the Army. The Horſe-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian Foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their quality ſet in array, apart from others, as if they had been of ſundry ſorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their several Captains. But at that time the great Battel of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the Horse-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his Enemies. For Aridæus was always governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three days before he had sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the Foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King who should have defended them, and of their affrighted Companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first Consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial Friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridæus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the Forces remaining with him. Then were the Funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose Body having been seven days neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Ægyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his Burial was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly Shew, making a stately Chariot in which the Corps was laid; many Coarses of his Friends being laid in the ground, before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building in Ægypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian War.

WHilst these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principal Noble-men, and inferior to none of Alexander's Followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a War, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexander's Life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his Death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be restored unto their former Places. He knew the factious quality of the Græcian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a sure Party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wan by this proud Injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open Tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in Estate, but retaining more than was needful, of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but seemed to bear themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justifie by Reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret Instructions to Leosthenes a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his own Name, and to keep it in a readiness for their use. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to do: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their Pay by the Captains. Of these he gathered up eight thousand, when the certain News were brought of Alexander's Death: at which time the City of Athens declared it self, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians, for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gave Battel to the Bœotians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in Reputation, and so strong in Adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was fain to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies afar off, which deceive all mortal wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as Death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his Life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published, sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches testifying his own jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with Life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian Expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the King's rigor was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sate Viceroy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiors, which would now repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the King's Death by poyson, given by his Son Iolaus, Alexander's Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth until opportunity had changed it into the passion of Revenge, which was cruelly performed by his Son Cassander: great cause of much fear he had, which I note in this place as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At

At the preſent Craterus was ſent for, and all the Captains of Companies lying near, ſollicited to make haſte. Not without cauſe. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raiſed more than thirteen thouſand Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe; which Muſter was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrey being emptied into Aſia. The Theſſalians indeed who had long ſtood firm for Philip and Alexander, who alſo were the beſt Horſe-men of Greece, furniſhed him with very brave Troops, that might have done great ſervice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With theſe Forces did Antipater in Theſſaly try the fortune of a Battel with Leoſthenes; rather (as may ſeem) fearing the increaſe of his Enemies power and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the firſt) than preſuming on his own ſtrength. For Leoſthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercinaries, two and twenty thouſand Foot, beſides the aſſiſtance of many petty Signories, and of ſome Illyrians, and Thracians: of Horſe he brought into the Field about two thouſand and five hundred; but over-ſtrong he was that way alſo, when once the Theſſalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater loſt the day: and his loſs was ſuch, that he neither was able to keep the Field, nor to make a ſafe retreat into his own Countrey: therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things neceſſary to bear out a Siege. Thither did Leoſthenes follow him, preſent him Battel again, and upon the refuſal cloſe up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the laſt honourable Enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

KIng Aridæus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatneſs conſiſting in a bare title, ſupported by the ſtrength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwiſe than to make uſe of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he ſhould viſit in his Government. A ſtronger Army than any of the reſt he had, which he might eaſily hope in that unſetled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accompliſh his deſires, he cloſely ſought the Marriage of Cleopatra, the Siſter of Alexander; yet about the ſame time he either married Nicæa the Daughter of Antipater, or made ſuch love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not ſomewhat narrowly ſearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the ſecond of that Name, and tenth King of that Countrey, had continued faithful to the Perſian Empire as long as it ſtood: following the example of his Forefathers, even from Pharnaces the firſt that raigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoſſa Siſter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Anceſtors had (indeed) been oppreſſed by the Perſians; but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue reſtored at another, and their faithful Princes had much increaſed all. But now in the fatal period of ſo great an Empire, with much wiſdom, and (Darius being ſlain) with ſufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perſians room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater buſineſs wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdom, ſurrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian Conqueſt, and for his own particular to have one opportune place of ſure retreat, under the government of a ſtedfaſt Friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the Field thirty thouſand Foot, and fifteen thouſand Horſe (a ſtrong Army, had it not encountred a ſtronger, and better trained) wan the Victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he uſe the Victory: for having taken Ariarathes Priſoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon: and ſo delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he truſted moſt.

Another part of his Forces he had committed to Python; rather as to the moſt honourable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſubdue the Greeks, rebelling in the high Countreys of Aſia. Above twenty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were ſoon weary of their unpleaſant Habitations, and the rude People, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the preſent Troubles to ſeek unto themſelves a better Fortune. Againſt theſe Python went, more deſirous to make them his own, than to deſtroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas diſcovering, did both give him in charge to put all thoſe Rebels to the Sword, giving the ſpoyls of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it unto Python's Captains (his own Creatures) that they ſhould ſee this Command executed. Theſe Directions for uſe of the Victory might have proved needleſs; ſo uncertain was the Victory it ſelf. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thouſand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the Fight (which was very doubtful) retire without neceſſity to a Hill not far off. This diſmayed the reſt, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered compoſition to the vanquiſhed, granting unto them their Lives and Liberty, under condition of laying down their Arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Maſter of theſe Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own Power: all Power being then valued by ſtrength in Followers, when as none could vaunt himſelf as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thouſand Foot, and eight thouſand eight hundred Horſe, beſides theſe new Companions, whom needleſs fear without great loſs had cauſed to leave the Field: but in true eſtimation, all the greatneſs whereof Python might think himſelf aſſured, was (and ſoon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thouſand Foot, and eight thouſand Horſe, of thoſe which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the Letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoyned to give aſſiſtance to that buſineſs: and by vertue of the Precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all thoſe poor men who had yielded themſelves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Maſter.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leiſure to purſue his hopes of Marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himſelf Lord of all: but this muſt be ſecretly carried for fear of oppoſition. How it ſucceeded will appear, when the Lamian War taketh ending. §. V.

§. V.

The proceſs of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly beſieged, wanting means to free himſelf without Succours from his Friends in Aſia. Thoſe Helps not appearing ſo ſoon as he expected, he came to parley with Leoſthenes, and would have yielded unto any terms of Reaſon, wherewith men poſſeſſed with hope of Victory do ſeldom limit their Deſires. Leoſthenes willed him without further circumſtance to ſubmit himſelf to diſcretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him ſuch a diſhonourable compoſition. Wherefore knowing that the Extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worſe with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of Victuals. In this lingring War, the Ætolians (whether weary of ſitting ſtill at a Siege, or having buſineſs which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Countrey. Their departure left the Trenches ſo thinly manned, that Antipater found means to ſally out upon his Enemies to their great loſs: for many were ſlain, and Leoſthenes himſelf among them, ere he could be repulſed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved; their Victuals waſted, and they were not ſtrong enough to deal with the Greeks in open Fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lyſimachus who was neareſt at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, againſt Seuthas their King, who brought into the Field above four times that number; and though Lyſimachus not without loſs had gotten one Victory, yet the Enemy abounding in multitude felt not the Blow ſo much as might abate his Courage. Therefore Leonatus was earneſtly ſollicited by Antipater's Friends, to make all haſte to the reſcue. He had the government of Phrygia the leſs, and was able to raiſe an Army of more than twenty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand five hundred Horſe, whether levied out of his Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the Journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, deſiring his preſence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her ſelf to be his Wife; which Letters he kept not ſo cloſe as had been requiſite, and therefore brought himſelf into great ſuſpicion, that ſoon ended with his Life. Antiphilus, choſen General by the Athenians in place of Leoſthenes, hearing of his approach, forſook the Siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to theſe great Conquerors of Aſia, with purpoſe to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they ſhould joyn in one. He had (notwithſtanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in Horſe, by the odds of two thouſand Theſſalians; in other things he was equal to him; in cauſe he thought himſelf ſuperior; in the fortune of that day he proved ſo: for he wan a great Victory (chiefly by vertue of the Theſſalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himſelf; who fighting valiantly was driven into a mariſh piece of ground, where he found his Death, which deſperately he had ſought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his Nativity. He was the firſt of Alexander's Captains which died in Battel, but all, or moſt of the reſt, ſhall follow him the ſame way. After this day the Athenians did never any thing ſuitable to their ancient glory. The vanquiſhed Macedonians were too weak to renew the Fight, and too proud to fly. They betook themſelves to high grounds, unfit for ſervice on Horſe-back, and ſo abode in ſight of the Enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their ſtrength to be at the greateſt, and fearing leſt that of the Enemy ſhould increaſe, did earneſtly ſeek to determine the matter quickly by another Battel. But ſtill Antipater kept himſelf on ground of advantage: which gave more than reaſonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the Enemy to be vanquiſhed. This wretchleſsneſs (incorrigible in an Army of Voluntaries) was very inexcuſable; ſeeing that the Victories by Land were much defaced by loſſes at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to have made themſelves once again Maſters, were put to the worſt.

But now the fatal Captivity of Greece came on, of which ſhe never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a ſtrong Army having made great Marches from Cilicia, paſſed over into Europe, and coming into Theſſaly joyned himſelf with Antipater. The Forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joyned in one, contained forty thouſand weightily armed, three thouſand light-armed men, and five thouſand Horſe; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thouſand and five hundred in Horſe, in Foot eighteen thouſand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoid the neceſſity of a Battel, until ſuch time as the Towns confederate ſhould return unto the Camp thoſe Bands which had ſtraggled from it. But thoſe Companies were ſo ſlow in coming, and Antipater ſo urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the Victory: for the Theſſalians had the upper hand, and held it, until ſuch time as they perceived their Battels (overlaid with multitude) retire unto the higher grounds, which cauſed them alſo to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the Field, having little elſe to boaſt of, conſidering that with the loſs of a hundred and thirty men, they had purchaſed only the death of ſome five hundred Enemies. Yet hereof was great uſe made. For the Greeks, as not ſubject unto the full Command of one General, and being every one deſirous to preſerve his own Eſtate, and City, concluded to make a Treaty of Peace with Antipater; who being a ſubtil Artificer, and well underſtanding their aptneſs to diviſion, refuſed to hearken to any general compoſition, but willed every City to deal apart for it ſelf. The intent of his device was ſo apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks chooſing rather to abide the coming of their Aſſiſtants, whoſe unreaſonable careleſneſs betrayed the Cauſe. Antipater and Craterus beſieging and winning ſome Towns in Theſſaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own aſſured and preſent Calamity.

Of the Peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demoſthenes his Death.

THe Theſſalians falling off, all the reſt ſoon followed ſeverally, and ſued for Peace; the gentle conditions given to the moſt forward, inviting ſuch as were ſlack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this Tumult; and their fear was not great; the Seat of the War being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their Imaginations; who ſate ſtill at Athens, deviſing upon courſes of proſecuting the War to come, which came to their doors, before their Conſultation could find iſſue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to reſiſt, and were as heartleſs as friendleſs. All that remained was to ſend Embaſſadors deſiring Peace upon ſome good terms: neceſſity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worſt. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philoſopher, were chief of this Embaſſage; Phocion as the moſt honourable; Demades as a ſtrong Perſwader (both of them well reſpected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for Wiſdom, Gravity of Manners, and Vertue; but all theſe Ornaments conſiſting in ſpeculation, and therefore of leſs regard, when their admiration was to coſt much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the Pride of Leoſthenes, required of the Athenians that they ſhould wholly ſubmit themſelves to his pleaſure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the Charges of the War paſt, to pay a Fine, and entertain a Garriſon. Further, he abrogated the Popular Eſtate, committing the Government of the City to thoſe of moſt Wealth, depriving of the Right of Suffrage all ſuch as wanted a convenient proportion of Riches.

About nine thouſand they were, all men of good ſubſtance, to whom the adminiſtration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the Name and form of a Democracy. But the raſcal Multitude of beggarly perſons, accuſtomed to get their Livings out of the common Troubles, being now debarred from bearing Offices and giving their Voices, cryed out that this was a meer Oligarchy, the violent Uſurpation of a few incroaching upon the publick Right. Theſe turbulent Fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to ſay, That War to them was Peace, and Peace War) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to moleſt the quiet of Athens.

To the ſame end (yet withal for ſatisfying his own ſuſpitions and hatred) he cauſed Demoſthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with ſome others to be ſlain. Had the Death of theſe two, eſpecially of Demoſthenes, been forborn, the reſt of his proceedings in this action might well have paſſed for very mild: whereas now all ſuch, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demoſthenes, or have ſurrendred their Judgments to Authors juſtly admiring him, as the moſt eloquent of all that ever did ſpeak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such Grace and Reputation do the learned Arts find in all civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemiſh any action, how good ſoever otherwiſe it be or honourably carried.

Demoſthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Iſle of Calauria; there did Archias (ſent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpoſe) find him, and gently perſwade him to leave the place, but not ſo prevailing he threatned violence. Then Demoſthenes entreating a little reſpite as it had been to write ſomewhat, ſecretly took Poyſon which he had kept for ſuch a neceſſity, and ſo died; rather chooſing to do the laſt Execution upon himſelf, than to fall into the hands of ſuch as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued ſome Valour in him, who was otherwiſe too much a Coward in Battel, howſoever valiant in perſwading to enterpriſes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through paſſages exceeding dangerous. He loved Money well, and had great ſums given him by the Perſian, to incourage him in finding Work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (methinks) in taking from the Perſians which loved not his Country, great rewards, for ſpeaking ſuch things as tended to his Countries Good; which he did not ceaſe to procure, when the Perſians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his Death can indure no honourable, though true mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipaters purpoſe to have done him great Honour. Sure it is, that he was a ſtedfaſt Enemy to the Macedonians; therefore diſcretion required that he ſhould be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief Command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Country, yet applying himſelf to the neceſſity of the Times; by which Commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this Peace, which (though grievous to Freemen, yet favourable to the Vanquiſhed) he endeavoured carefully to preſerve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian Wars into Aſia. The Grounds of the firſt Civil War between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they ſtrengthened their Friendſhip with a new Alliance, Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went againſt the Ætolians, whoſe Poverty was not ſo eaſily daunted, as the Luxurious Wealth of the more Powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many Places of great faſtneſs, into which they conveyed ſuch of their Goods as they moſt eſteemed, and of their People as were leaſt fit for War, with the reſt they fortified the ſtrongeſt of their Cities, and ſo abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully reſiſted. With great obſtinacy did the Macedonians contend againſt the difficulties of the Places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their Victuals held out. But when Craterus had ſhut up all Paſſages, and utterly debarred them of Relief; then were they put to a miſerable Choice; either to deſcend from their ſtrong Holds and fight upon equal Ground with unequal Numbers, or to endure the Miſeries of Hunger and Cold, againſt which they could make no long reſiſtance; or to yield themſelves to the Macedonians: who incenſed by the loſs of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave ſo ſtubborn Enemies in Places which which might give confidence to Rebellion. In cases of extremity, much fineness of Wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want Meat; but their Enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their Courage. For such news came out of Asia into the Macedonian Camp, as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giving them whatsoever Conditions they would ask; yet with purpose to call them to severe account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by Captivity, when once they should have setled the Affairs of Asia, as they hoped and desired. But of mens Purposes God is the Disposer: in whose high Councel it was ordained that this poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the Proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open Gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the Reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served meerly as an Introduction to all the Civil Wars ensuing.

The Grounds of the Asiatique Expedition, which did set the World in an Up-roar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captains the mightiest in Reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient Precedency, and the present Rule which he bare in the parts of Europe: The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been, whom the advantage of his Presence at the Kings Death did make equal, or superiour to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were to have consorted with these two, and to have been with them a third Partner in the Government of all: to which purpose he entertained the Discourse of Marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that Gale of Wind which bore him up, he began to take Wing and soar quite an other way. Aridæus was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the Title of that Majesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the days of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery Lustre to their actions, as may dazel the eyes of the Beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the Sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the Children sold for Slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example grown desperate, when after two or three days tryal they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their Houses and set the Town on fire, into the Flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the Walls.

These Exploits being performed, the Army had no other Work than to sift the Ashes of the burnt City for Gold and Silver; but Perdiccas had business of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without imployment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilest others grew great, and took deep root in their several Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his Forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the Seat of his Ancestors, and Head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Viceroys (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding Authority, the Match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatness meet with a good Title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the Power of Ptolomy might give, who held Ægypt well fortified with men, but much better with Love of the People; yet if the business prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himself, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busie headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a Man of War, of as deep a Judgment, as high a Spirit, and as great Undertaking as any of Alexanders Captains. His imployments had been less than some of theirs, which made him also the less respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs; for he valued himself by his own Worth, not by the Opinions of other men; with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turn, caused him to be charged with such Accusations as might suffice to take away his Life, especially by a Judge that sought his Death. This device Antigonus would not seem to perceive, but prepared himself in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himself and his Son Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies that carried him to Antipater, laden with such Tidings as finished the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their own danger: so his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his Intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the Sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at Home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his Government of Ægypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chief Citizens; and now in the midst of these Garboils he celebrated the Funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himself much good will and many Partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

Perdiccas His Voyage into Ægypt, and his Death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main Power, at length resolved to set upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his use, againſt Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Aſia bordering upon Europe.

It may ſeem ſtrange, that he did not rather make head againſt thoſe who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him ſoon enough. Sure it is that he took a bad courſe, and made it worſe with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his ſweet Behaviour allured many to his Party, without help of any bad Arts. Perdiccas contrariwiſe was full of Inſolency, which never failed to be rewarded with Hatred; that is truly defined. An Affection founded upon Opion of an unjuſt Contempt. The whole Story of his procceedings in Ægypt is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilful man) tired his Followers, and waſted them in hard Enterpriſes without ſucceſs. His moſt forceable Attempt was upon a little Town called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haſte than good ſpeed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himſelf into the place, where behaving himſelf not only as a good Commander, but as a ſtout Souldier, he gave the Foil to Perdiccas, cauſing him to retire with loſs, after a vehement, but vain Aſſauſt continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made an other Journey (which was his laſt) and came to the diviſions of Nilus, over againſt Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to paſs over his Army into an Iſland where he meant to incamp. The Current was ſtrong, the Water deep, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the Paſſage, to break the violence of the Stream, and his Horſe-men beneath it; to take up ſuch as were carried away by ſwiftneſs of the Water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further Bank, the Channel began to wax deep; ſo that whereas the former Companies had waded up to the Chin, they who ſhould have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by riſing of the Water, or ſlitting away of the Ground (the Earth being broken with the Feet of ſo many Men, Horſe, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but ſuch as had paſſed muſt re-paſs again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the Enemy, and could not be relieved by their Fellows. With great confuſion therefore they committed themſelves to the River wherein above two thouſand of them periſhed, a thouſand were devoured by Crocodiles; a miſerable Spectacle even to ſuch as were out of danger; ſuch as were ſtrong and could ſwim recovered the Camp, many were carried down the Stream, and driven to the contrary Bank, where the fell into the hands of their Enemies.

This misfortune exaſperated the Souldiers againſt their General, giving liberty to their Tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their Hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Ptolomy, which did ſet them in an Up-roar. Ptolomy had not only ſhewed much compaſſion on thoſe who fell into his hands alive, but performed all Rights of Funeral to the dead Carcaſſes, which the River had caſt upon his ſide; and finally, ſent their Bones and Aſhes to be interred by their Kinſmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall to mutiny, thinking it unreaſonable to make War upon ſo vertuous and honourable a Perſon, to fulfil the Pleaſure of a Lordly ambitious man, uſing them like Slaves. The Sedition growing ſtrong, wanted only a Head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the Diſgrace which he had ſuffered by his procurement after the Victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Python had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diviſion of the Provinces made Governour of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorſhip excepted) equal to him, had nevertheleſs been ſcornfully uſed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horſe, which conſiſted of the Gentry, (the Foot-men having declared themſelves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where, without further circumſtance they all ran upon him, and ſlew him. Such end had the proud miſgoverning Authority of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have ſuffered any as great as himſelf; yea, peradventure Maſter of all, had he not been too maſterly over thoſe which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excuſed himſelf of things paſt, as not having been Author, or given cauſe of the War, and was eaſily believed: the Favour of the Army being ſuch toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this he refuſed. It was an Office fit for one, that would ſeek to increaſe his greatneſs with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deſerving of him, he procured that honourable Charge to Python, and to Aridæus the Captain, who having had ſome Companies of Souldiers to furniſh with their attendance the Solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him againſt Perdiccas.

In the midſt of theſe buſineſſes came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three days ſooner, had been entertained with joyful acclamations; and would have given ſuch reputation to Perdiccas, as had cauſed both his private Maligners to to continue his open Flatterers, and his open Enemies to have accepted any tolerable compoſition. But theſe good tidings coming in ill time, when death had ſtopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Aſia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things, happening about the perſon of the King, it is meet that we ſpeak of thoſe buſineſſes in the lower Aſia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whileſt Perdiccas was occupied in the Ægyptian Wars. Alcetas, the Brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be aſſiſtant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat anſwer, That he would not; alledging the backwardneſs of his men to bear Arms againſt ſo great a Perſon as Antipater, and a man ſo much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair ſhew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himſelf the better man. Eumenes diſcovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the miſchief lurking in his heart, wiſely diſſembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and ſweet language, that com-commonly are loſt, when beſtowed upon arrogant Creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himſelf, that he might ſtand upon his own ſtrength, he raiſed out of the Countries under his Juriſdiction, about ſix thouſand Horſe, giving many priviledges to ſuch as were ſerviceable, and training them well up. Not without great need: For when upon advertiſement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly paſſed the Helleſpont) for the invaſion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in Hoſtile manner, though unprovoked, preſented him Battel. Neoptolemus had ſecretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conqueſt of Aſia, which now intending to perform, he was ſhamefully diſappointed. For though his Foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Battels; yet were his Horſe driven out of the Field, and himſelf compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian Foot-men, to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in ſuch wiſe, that caſting down their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their Oath to do him faithful ſervice. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promiſes to draw Eumenes into their Society, who contrariwiſe offered himſelf, as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; profeſſing withal his hatred to Antipater, and conſtant faith to the cauſe which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whileſt theſe Negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater and his Aſſociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which fooliſh railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; aſſuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won, for they would all forth-with revolt unto him. Earneſtly therefore he deſired them to give him aid againſt Eumenes, and eſpecially requeſted that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be ſent. Their own affections did eaſily lead them to condeſcend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much, as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midſt of Alexander's vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themſelves to the Perſian faſhions of Garments, and Cuſtoms, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld theſe new tricks of Aſia with diſcontented Eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their Native Country. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyn with Ptolomy. Craterus uſed great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as he hoped) according to the common faſhion of Captains after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well-adviſed Enemy to encounter, who kept good eſpial upon him, and with much wiſdom fore-ſaw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battel, yea, without ſtroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was ſuch as much exceeded his own in Foot-men, but was inferiour in Horſe-men) and thought it more uneaſie to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a ſtrange piece of work, which deſperation (of all courſes elſe) taught him, and wiſe managing, proſperouſly accompliſhed. He gave out reports that Neoptolemus was returned with ſuch company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great eſtimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men againſt Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be deſpiſed and hated among them, (as having been vanquiſhed by ſome of them, and forſaken others in plain Field, whileſt they valiantly fought in his Quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the Enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Meſſenger nor Trumpeter ſhould be admitted; and not herewith ſatisfied, he placed againſt Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Perſians, under the leading of ſuch, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himſelf. To theſe alſo he gave in charge, that without ſpeaking or hearkening to any word, they ſhould run upon the Enemy, and give him no leiſure to ſay or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own perſon: but placing himſelf in the right wing of his Battel, oppoſite to Neoptolemus, who (as he underſtood) conducted the left wing on the contrary ſide, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the Enemy as ſoon as the diſtance would give leave. A riſing piece of ground lay between them, which having aſcended, the Armies diſcovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long Journies, which over-haſtily they had made, ſeeking the deceitful iſſue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in ſurpriſing them as Enemies) to diſcover himſelf to his old Friends and fellow-ſouldiers, of whom he could ſee none. Phœnix, a Tenidian, and Artabazus, a Perſian, had the leading of that ſide, who mindful of their inſtructions, began to give upon him with ſuch countenance, as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight and win the day, and take the ſpoil to themſelves. But the Bear whoſe skin he ſells, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battel was fought gave moſt advantage to the Horſe, who encountred very roughly on all parts; eſpecially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as ſoon as they had diſcovered one another, could not contain themſelves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting looſe their Bridles, grappled ſo violently together, that their Horſes ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus roſe firſt up, but Eumenes had his Sword firſt drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, cauſing him to fall down and fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving ſlight ones, took ſuch as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) ſtripped by his Mortal Enemy, whoſe revilings he requited, lying even at the laſt gaſp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous, had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus cauſed his followers to run away upon the ſpur, and ſeek ſhelter behind the battels of their Foot. They were nothing hotly purſued: For Eumenes pained himſelf to carry ſuccour to his left wing, which he ſuſpected much to be diſtreſſed, but found accompanied with the ſame Fortune, that had aſſiſted him when he fought in Perſon. Craterus had gallantly born himſelf himſelf a while, and ſuſtained the impreſſion of Artabazus and Phœnix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his Honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little eſtimation or note. Otherwiſe it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preſerved himſelf to a better adventure by giving ground, as the reſt (when he and Neoptolemus were ſlain) did. But whileſt he ſought to preſerve his Reputation, he loſt his life by the fall of his Horſe, or his falling from his Horſe, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and ſo periſhed unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whoſe death he was now become the inſtrument. The vanquiſhed Army entertained a Treaty of Peace with Eumenes, making ſhew of willingneſs to become his followers; but their intent was only to refreſh themſelves, which (by his permiſſion) having done, they ſtole away by Night, and fled toward Antipater.

This Battel fought within ten days of the former wan to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the news. But other matters there were which incenſed men againſt him, beſides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifeſtly appeared, that he was as ſorry as any that pretended greater heavineſs. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wiſely amended, by giving to them the ſpoil of ſuch Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a guard for defence of his Perſon. Others were not ſo eaſie to be reconciled. They who had been Traytors to Perdiccas hated him for his faithfulneſs, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their falſhood; neither found they any fairer way of excuſing their late revolt, than by accuſing and condemning the ſide which they had forſaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traytor, and condemned him to die: but it was an eaſier matter to give that ſentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python reſigns his Office, into which Antipater is choſen.

Python and Aridæus being choſen Protectors of King Aridæus, and the Children of Alexander, took the way to Aſia the Leſs, conducting the Army through Syria. Of theſe two Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to ſuſtain ſo important a charge. For Eurydice, Wife to King Aridæus, was come to her Husband, a Lady of a Maſculine ſpirit, well underſtanding what ſhe was or ſhould be, and thinking her ſelf able to ſupport the weight which Fortune had laid upon her fooliſh Husband, being due to her own Title. Her Mother Cyna, Siſter to Alexander by her Father Philip, was Married (as hath been ſhewed) to Amyntas, who was right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only Son of King Perdiccas, Philip's elder Brother.

This Cyna was a Warlike Woman; ſhe had led Armies, and (as a true Siſter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Cæria Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago like unto her ſelf, had ſlain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the ſame unwomanly Art of War, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her Education, to the ſmall contentment of Python, that could not brook her curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were ſo that Python had ſome purpoſe to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom; (as once he had ſought to do) or whether the Queen did ſuſpect him of ſome ſuch intent; or whether only deſire of Rule cauſed her to quarrel with him, quarrel ſhe did, which diſturbed the proceeding againſt Eumenes. The Army having ſhaken off ſuch a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himſelf upon his Office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings Name, which the Queen did oftentimes controul, uſing the ſame name, with more Authority, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, ſeeing this, would needs reſign his Office, whether upon wearineſs of the contentions daily growing, or on purpoſe to bring the Queen into envy, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthieſt man in the Camp, he ſhould be intreated to retain the place, and have his Authority confirmed, or (as might be) increaſed, were it but for want of a fit Succeſſor. Eurydice was nothing ſorry at this courſe; for now ſhe thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troubleſome aſſiſtance of a Protector. But the Souldiers diſappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; chooſing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexander's Captains then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earneſtly with the Macedonians, that they ſhould acknowledge no Lord ſave only the King their Sovereign. Yet ſhe failed of her purpoſe, being hindred (as may ſeem) by three things: the apparent weakneſs of her Husband, the growth of Alexander's Children, who (though born of outlandiſh Women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightineſs of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand arrived in few days at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her ſelf content. Antipater was of ſuch power, that he needed not to work by any cloſe devices, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained alive acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he diſplaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royal Army: to whom for his good ſervices done, and to be done againſt Eumenes, he gave the rule of Suſiana, beſides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Government of Aſia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Aſia, wins a Battel of Eumenes, and beſiegeth him in Nora: He vanquiſheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatneſs of Antigonus, whoſe power in few years over-growing the reſt, wanted little of ſpreading it ſelf over the whole Monarchy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus the Brother, and Attalus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the Publick Service, till ſuch time as he might find occaſion to make uſe of it in his own buſineſs.

buſineſs. The firſt of theſe which he undertook was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refuſed to joyn, having unſeaſonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army ſtrong in number, courage, and all needful proviſions; but obedient only at diſcretion. Therefore Antigonus tryed all ways of corrupting his Souldiers, tempting firſt the whole Army with Letters; which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made ſhew as if he himſelf had ſcattered abroad thoſe Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with ſuch Captains, as he thought moſt eaſie to be won. Of theſe Captains one rebelled, breaking out too haſtily before any help was near him, yet looking ſo careleſly to himſelf, that he and his were ſurpriſed, when he thought his Enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good Fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his Treachery ſecret, reſerving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the Treaſon which this falſe man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus preſented Battel to Eumenes; in the heat whereof, Apollonides, General of the Horſe to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary ſide, with ſuch as he could get to follow him: but was cloſely followed by ſome, whoſe company he deſired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable miſchief which this traiterous practice brought upon him, purſued the Villain, and cut him off before he could thruſt himſelf into the Troups of Antigonus, and boaſt of his Treachery. This was ſome comfort to Eumenes in the loſs of that Battel, which diſabled him utterly to keep the Field, and left it very hard for him to make a ſafe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his Enemies, and (though a matter of ſmall importance) cauſed Antigonus himſelf to admire his high reſolution. It was held no ſmall part of the Victory to get poſſeſſion of the dead Bodies. Eumenes, whileſt Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compaſs returned to the place where the Battel had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and aſhes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raiſing up heaps of Earth as Mountains over them, and ſo went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave ſpirit; ſo the news which Menander (who was ſet to look unto their Carriages) brought and publiſhed among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable Friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careleſs, as after an aſſured Victory, and loaden with the ſpoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long Service, all which he might have taken: but fearing leſt ſuch a purchaſe ſhould prove a heavy burthen to him, whoſe chief hope conſiſted in ſwift expedition, he gave ſecret warning to Menander to flie to the Mountains, whileſt he detained his men (whom Authority could not have reſtrained) by this ſleight, ſetting them to bait their Horſes. The Macedonians extolled him for this courteſie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to ſtrip them out of all their Wealth, and make their Children Slaves, and to raviſh their Wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meer ſubtilty had avoided thoſe precious Fetters, which would have hindred his ſpeedy flight. He told them true: For Eumenes did not only think all Carriages to be over-burdenſome, but the number of his men to be more troubleſome than available, in his intended courſe. Wherefore he ſent them from him as faſt as he could, wiſhing them to ſhift for themſelves; and retaining only five hundred Horſe, and two hundred Foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora; where again, keeping no more about him, than neceſſity required to make good the place, he lovingly diſmiſſed all the reſt. Nora was a little Fortreſs in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, ſo ſtrongly ſituated, that it ſeemed impregnable; and ſo well victualled and ſtored with all Neceſſaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more deſire to make him his Friend, than to vanquiſh him in War. To this purpoſe he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For whereas Antigonus offered him Pardon, and his love; Eumenes required reſtitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipater's conſent. Then was Nora cloſed up; where Antigonus leaving ſufficient ſtrength for continuance of the Siege, took his Journey into Piſidia againſt Alcetas and Attalus, with whom he made ſhort work. He came upon them unexpected, and ſeized on paſſages, which wanted not men, but ſuch a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetas and Attalus, as they had been too ſecure before his coming, ſo were they too adventurous in fighting at the firſt ſight, upon all diſadvantages; and their folly was attended with ſutable event. Attalus with many principal Captains was taken; Alcetas fled to the City of Termeſus, where the love of the younger ſort was toward him ſo vehement, that ſtopping their Ears againſt all perſwaſions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: For the Governours of the Town, having ſecretly compounded with Antigonus, cauſed the young men to ſally out; and uſing the time of advantage, they with their Servants did ſet upon Alcetas, who unable to reſiſt, ſlew himſelf. His dead Body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarouſly torn, was caſt forth without Burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the Carcaſs with ſolemn Funerals, having once been minded to ſet on fire their own Town, in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchaſed with courteous liberality: but to make an able General, one vertue, how great ſoever, is inſufficient.

Ptolomy wins Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, the reſt of the Princes lay idle, rather ſeeking to enjoy their Governments for the preſent, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomy looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumſtance in the managing. He ſent a Lieutenant thither with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon Priſoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may ſeem) without any great ſtrength of Souldiers, far from aſſiſtants, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with ſeeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater

Antipater was old and ſickly, deſirous of reſt, and therefore contented to let Antigonus purſue the diſpatch of thoſe buſineſſes in Aſia. He had with him Polyſperchon, one of the moſt ancient of Alexander's Captains, that had lately ſuppreſſed a dangerous Inſurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had ſtirred in the Quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the firſt, but ſoon loſing all that they had gained, whileſt Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyſperchon Antipater did repoſe great confidence; ſo far forth, that (ſuſpecting the Youth of his own Son Caſſander of inſufficiency in ſo great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his Death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorſhip. So Antipater died, being fourſcore years old, having always travelled in the great Affairs of mighty Princes, with ſuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatneſs was jealous of him, and the Succeſſors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppoſitions. In his private qualities he was a ſubtile man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philoſophical behaviour; not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Ariſtotle, and written ſome Hiſtories. He had been much moleſted by Olympias, Alexander's Mother, whom after the death of her Son he compelled to abſtain from coming into Macedonia, or intermedling in matters of Eſtate: yea, at his own death he gave eſpecial direction, that no Woman ſhould be permitted to deal in the adminiſtration of the Empire. But this Precept was ſoon forgotten; and yet, ere long, by ſorrowful experience approved to have been found and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polyſperchon who ſucceeded unto Antipater in the Protectorſhip. The Inſurrection of Caſſander againſt him.

Polyſperchon was very skilful in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that Occupation; other qualities, requiſite in ſo high an Office as he underwent, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his buſineſs more formally, than wiſely, as a man of a ſecond wit, fitter to aſſiſt, than to Command in Chief. At the firſt entrance upon the Stage he called to Council all his Friends, wherein, for weighty conſiderations (as they who weighed not the contrary reaſons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the preſence of Alexander's Mother might countenance and ſtrengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad ſhould keep greater Armies, than were needful or eaſie to be retained about the Perſon of the King in Macedonia; it ſeemed expedient, that the face of the Court ſhould be filled with all Majeſty, that might give Authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard contain within the bounds of Duty ſuch as could not by force have been kept in order, being ſtrong, and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of ſight, whileſt preſent miſchief lay unregarded in their boſoms. Caſſander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to diſcover that great ſufficiency in Polyſperchon, for which his Father had repoſed in him ſo much confidence: neither could he diſcern ſuch odds in the Quality of himſelf and Polyſperchon, as was in their Fortune. He was left Captain of one thouſand; which Office by practice of thoſe times was of more importance, than the Title now ſeems to imply. He ſhould thereby have been as Camp-Maſter, or Lieutenant General to the other: a place no way ſatisfying his ambition, that thought himſelf the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare with the Forces likely to oppoſe him. All that had relied on his Father were his own aſſured, eſpecially ſuch as commanded the Garriſons beſtowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magiſtrates, and others of principal Authority, in thoſe Common-weals, whoſe forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the ſide, and draw in many partakers: it concerned theſe men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains by whom their Faction was upheld; and by whom the raſcal multitude, covetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exerciſed over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Beſides all theſe helps, Caſſander had the ſecret love of Queen Eurydice, who had in private rendred him ſuch courteſie, as was due only to her Husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other poſſibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open Rebellion, becauſe he ſaw Polyſperchon much reverenced among the Macedonians, and ſtrong enough to ſuppreſs him before he could have made head. Therefore he made ſhew of following his pleaſures in the Country, and calling many of his Friends about him, under pretence of Hunting, adviſed with them upon the ſafeſt courſe, and moſt free from all ſuſpicion. The neceſſity was apparent of raiſing an Army, before the buſineſs were ſet on foot; and to do this, Opportunity preſented him with fair means. Ptolomy had by fine force, without any Commiſſion, annexed Syria to his Government of Ægypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to truſt him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the firſt news of Antipater's death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in ſuch ſort that he manifeſtly diſcovered his intent of making himſelf Lord of all Aſia. Theſe two therefore ſtood in need of a Civil War; which Caſſander well noted, and preſumed withal, That the friendſhip which had paſſed between his Father and them, would avail him ſomewhat. Whereupon he ſecretly diſpatched Meſſengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himſelf on a ſudden over the Helleſpont, that he might in perſon advance the buſineſs with greater ſpeed. Much perſwaſion is needleſs in winning a man to what he deſireth. Antigonus coveted nothing more, than to find Polyſperchon work by raiſing ſome Commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities muſt not be neglected) Caſſander did very earneſtly preſs him, by the memory of his Father, and all requiſite conjurations, to aſſiſt him in this enterpriſe; telling him that Ptolomy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a ſpeedy diſpatch. Antigonus on the other ſide repayed him with the ſame coin; ſaying, That for his own ſake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of ſuccour. Having thus feaſted one another with words, they were nothing ſlack in preparing the common means leading to their ſeveral ends.

§. XIV.

§. XIV.

The unworthy course held by Polysperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

GReat necessity there was of timely provision. For Polysperchon needed no other Instructions to inform him of Cassander's drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomy, to the strengthning of Rebellion: and well he knew that one principal hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Græcian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Councel, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principal Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supream Authority, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassander's Friends, and to raise up many Enemies to him in all Quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankful nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extream ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Father's actions, whose only bounty had enabled him to do it? or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, Friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private Enemy, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans Body, through sinews newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in Bodies politick, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curb them in their neareſt purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to pass, that contrary Religions are invited to help against neighbour Princes; bordering Enemies drawn in, to take part in Civil Wars; and ancient hatred called to counsel against injurious Friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; she hath taught the Arm to offer it self unto manifest loss in defence of the Head: they are depraved affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetful of the more general good, for which they were created.

The Decree, whereby the Greeks were presented with a vain shew of liberty, ran under the King's Name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polysperchon had guided his Pen. For the main point was, That they should follow such Directions as Polysperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deal of kindness, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appear to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great Commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchon's Decree. The Death of Phocion.

NEvertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the Place, and Menillus (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way grateful to the Citizens, who soon after hearing the news of Antipater's Death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that Accident, and might by advertising them in due time have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these Exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievously would they have been offended, had they known the Instructions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should find means to thrust some Companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principal Haven, against the high-Town. How to accomplish this he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Councel, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the King's Proclamation; whither upon Phocion's word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the War which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they urged him first of all, to make them Masters of their own, which how to use they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did always measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor Prisoner. But Phocion who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himself therein: to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander the Son of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after, with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shews, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias taking upon her to command, before she durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Ni- canor to reſtore to the Athenians the Places which he held: but he would firſt conſider more of the matter. Polyſperchon had further ordained, that the Iſle of Samos ſhould be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) ſo far from purpoſing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themſelves. The commodity of their Havens was ſuch, as he would rather get into his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wiſhed in theirs, than in Caſſander's. His Son Alexander not ignorant of this, made fair ſhew to the Athenians, and ſpent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but ſuffered not them, for whom he ſeemed to labour, to intermeddle with the buſineſs. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the diſpleaſure they conceived againſt him they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his Office. This was done with much tumult: baniſhed men and ſtrangers, thruſting themſelves into the Aſſembly of the Citizens, who diſtracted with ſundry paſſions, growing out of their preſent misfortunes, thought every one that beſt could inveigh againſt things paſt, a moſt likely man to find ſome remedy for the evil threatning them. In this Hurliburly was Alexander deviſing how he might come to ſome good point of compoſition with Nicanor, and held much privy conference with him; which he could not ſo ſecretly carry; but that his Negotiation was diſcovered, whereby the uproar in the Town was ſo far increaſed, that Phocion with many of his Friends were accuſed, and driven to ſeek ſafeguard of their Lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his Letters of commendation to his Father, deſiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyſperchon was in the Countrey of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the Letters which they brought, and their own deſerts, (having always been Friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrey gave leave) ſhould be enough to get patronage to their Innocency. Beſides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyſperchon's familiar Friend, went along with them, (in an evil hour) who promiſed to himſelf and them great favour by means of his Acquaintance. But Polyſperchon was an unſtable man, very earneſt in what he took in hand, yet, either for want of judgment in following them, or of honeſty in holding the beſt of them, eaſily changing his intended courſes, and doing things by the halfs, which made him commonly fail of good ſucceſs. For fear of Caſſander, he had offered wonderful kindneſs to the Athenians; this had cauſed them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and ſeek how to get into his own hands thoſe Keys, with which Caſſander held them faſt lockt up: finding himſelf diſappointed of this purpoſe, and ſuſpected as a falſe diſhonourable man, he ſtood wavering between the contrary allurements of Profit and Reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow deſperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece began to caſt their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wiſeſt way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular Faction, which then was grown to be Maſter of that City. And in good time for this purpoſe were the Athenian Ambaſſadors come, treading (as one may ſay) upon Phocion's heels, whom they were ſent to accuſe. Theſe had ſolemn audience given to them in the King's preſence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oſtentations ſake was glorified with all exterior ſhews of Majeſty; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he ſaw others do. For beginning of the buſineſs Polyſperchon commanded that Dinarchus ſhould be tortured and ſlain: This was enough to teſtifie his hearty affection to the Commonalty of Athens, in that he ſpared not his old Acquaintance for their ſake; whoſe Ambaſſadors he then bad to ſpeak. When their errand was done, and anſwer to it made by the accuſed, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the reſt were pronounced guilty of Treaſon; but to give Sentence, and do the execution upon them, was (for Honours ſake) referred unto the City of Athens, becauſe they were Burgeſſes. Then were they ſent away to Athens, where the raſcal multitude, not ſuffering them to ſpeak for themſelves, condemned them to die. So they periſhed being innocent. But the Death of Phocion, a man very conſpicuous, made the fortune of the reſt to be of the leſs regard. Five and forty times had he been choſen Governour of the City, never ſuing for the Place, but ſent for when he was abſent: ſo well was his Integrity known, and ſo highly valued, even of ſuch as were no pretenders to the ſame vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the City repent of having followed his counſel: nor any private man of having truſted his word. Philip of Macedon highly eſteemed him ſo; and much more did Alexander, who (beſides other ſigns of his love) ſent him two hundred Talents of ſilver, and offered to beſtow upon him of four Cities in Aſia any one which he would chooſe. But Phocion refuſed theſe and other gifts, howſoever importunately thruſt upon him; reſting well contented with his honeſt poverty: wherein he lived above fourſcore years, and then was compelled by the unjuſt judgment of wicked men to drink that poyſon, which by juſt judgment of the righteous God, ſo infected the City of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man reſembling the vertue of their Ancients.

§. XVI.

Of Polyſperchon his vain Expedition againſt Caſſander.

NOt long after theſe things were done, Caſſander with ſuch Forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which news drew Polyſperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but ſo ill victualed, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given ſome impediment to the Enemy; who not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and make new Purchaſes abroad. Finding therefore himſelf unable to drive Caſſander out of Athens, he left his Son Alexander, with ſuch number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of Victuals, to withſtand his further incroaching. The greateſt part of his Army he carried into Peloponneſus, to make the Countrey ſure to himſelf, wherein Caſſander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponneſus were ſuch, as they had been in other Parts of Greece. Firſt, he began to fight with Edicts, reſtoring the Democracy, or popular form of Government. He commanded that the

the principal Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, ſhould be either ſlain or driven into exile. This Decree took immediate effect in moſt places; the vulgar ſort being very ready to ſeal the Charter of their Freedom and Authority with the Blood of thoſe who had kept them in ſubjection. yet many Cities there were which delighted in the Rule of the chief Citizens, and manly which wiſhed well to Caſſander; eſpecially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyſperchon meant to inflict an exemplary Puniſhment of Diſobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thouſand ſerviceable men, well furniſhed with neceſſaries, and reſolved to endure the worſt. And need there was of ſuch reſolution. For Polyſperchon coming thither with all his Power did ſo much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the ſpace of Wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the Breach; and at the ſame time, with great labour, they raiſed up an inner Wall, to bear out the next Aſſault. The Aſſailants having failed to carry the Town at the firſt attempt, took much pains to clear the Ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whoſe Violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townſmen perceiving their drift, prepared Boards driven through with long Nails, which they uſed as Gall-throps, beſtowing them ſlightly, covered with the points upwards, in the way by which the Beaſts were to paſs. Neither did they ſet any to encounter them in Front, but appointed certain light-armed men to beat upon their ſides with Arrows and Darts, as they were inſtructed by ſome that had learned the manner of that Fight in the Aſian Warrs. Of theſe Proviſions they made happy uſe in the next Aſſault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the Enemy chiefly truſted) either ſorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polyſperchon came as ill furniſht for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to diſpatch the buſineſs quickly, nor to take ſuch leiſure as was requiſite, he forſook the Siege, with ſome loſs, and much diſhonour, leaving ſome part of his Army to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this, he ſent Clitus his Admiral to Sea, to joyn with Aridæus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all Succour which might come to the Enemy out of Aſia. Caſſander alſo ſent his whole Fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him ſome Ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the Overthrow, gathered together the Ships that were eſcaped, and manning them very well, ſent out Nicanor again, aſſuring him of the Victory, as well he might. For he ſent out ſufficient numbers of Light-armed men, whom he had cauſed to be wafted over the Straights in ſmall Veſſels by night; theſe before day-light ſetting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay ſecurely on the Land, headlong into their Ships; in which Tumult, Nicanor arriving, did aſſail them ſo luſtily, that few or none eſcaped him.

This Loſs at Sea, together with his bad Succeſs by Land, brought Polyſperchon into great contempt. He had a good facility in penning bloody Decrees; but when the Execution was referred to his own Sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians perceiving that he had left them to ſhift for themſelves, and was not able to give them Protection againſt the Enemy which lay in their Boſoms, came to agreement with Caſſander, accepting a Governour of his appointment; and reſtoring all things to the ſame State wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the Party of Caſſander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him; as to an induſtrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Country ſet in a combuſtion, uneaſie to be quenched; which preſented unto Antigonus an opportunity that he neglected not, of making himſelf Lord of Aſia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus ſeeks to make himſelf an abſolute Lord; and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who diſappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipaters life time a firm reſolution, to make unto himſelf the utmoſt benefit that he might of the Army committed to his Charge. And in fair ſeaſon for advancement of his purpoſes came the news of Antipaters Death; even then, when all the buſineſs in Piſidia was diſpatched, and no more imployment for the Army remaining, ſave only the continuance of the Siege of Nora; a ſmall thing of it ſelf, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was moſt precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the preſent State was manifeſtly ſubject, would in continuance of ſome years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his Enemies in that ſpace could work againſt him. His moſt fear was, that for want of exerciſe in that narrow Caſtle, his Men and Horſes might grow ſickly and unſerviceable: which made him to practiſe many deviſes of keeping them in health and luſty. But when he had continued ſhut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good paſs, and he was eaſed of his Cares by Antigonus himſelf, whoſe Forces held him beſieged.

Antigonus knowing the great ſufficiency of Eumenes, and conſidering his Fidelity ſhewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the World a fitter man than him, to imply in managing thoſe high deſigns, wherein he doubted not that he ſhould be withſtood by the mightieſt Princes of the Empire. He ſent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with ſome part of his intent, and promiſing to make him a greater Lord than ever he had been, and the next man to himſelf, if things fell out as he deſired, in regard whereof he required only his Friendſhip, and thereupon ſent him an Oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleaſure iſſue ſafely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect Liberty. Eumenes peruſing the Form of the Oath, perceived the meaning of Antigonus; which was rather to make him his Follower than his Fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the Blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any Loyal Intent; the binding words and ſum of all the reſt were ſuch as tied him faſt only to Antigonus, omitting all reſervation of Duty to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unſeemly to become a ſworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the Maſtery; and being aſſured that his voluntary aſſiſtance, which way ſoever he gave, would be more acceptable, and far more honourable than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the Negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming; but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the Oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his Words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the Children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their Adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of Provinces, behaving himself according to the Authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of War. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justifie his Proceedings. For if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his Death-bed bequeathed unto him as a Legacy, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lievtenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in presence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his Death? To give a fair colour to his Ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three-score thousand Foot-men, ten thousand Horse, and thirty Elephants in a readiness to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridæus Governour of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and fought to have won Cyzicus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the Country. Aridæus was so far from obeying him, that he sent Forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such Companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like Fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his Fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good Words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes, Eumenes having Authority from the Court, raiseth great War against Antigonus, in defence of the Royal House.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia the less, was able to have entred Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to do, it proceeded (as may seem) for some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as fear in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation; It would ask more time than he could spare; and the Envy which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make War upon him in defence of the Royal House, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his Course, and with an Army of twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithful to their dead Master, which being well known in the Court, he had Commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Army, and make War upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings Treasure as much as he should need. Other Letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or Silver-shielded Bands, Commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old Followers gathered together two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, before this Authority was given him; but now he purposed with all the strength that he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal Blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her and her Nephew the Son of Alexander, and in the mean time, to give her his advice in that which Polysperchon required of her, for she was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his Ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the War to a good issue; which done, he promised that his Faith and Care should not be wanting to the Seed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarse any one could be found among the Noble Men, in whom Alexanders Mother, Wives and Children, might repose firm Confidence, saving only this Eumenes, a Stranger to the Macedonian Blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His Reputation was no more than his own Vertue had made it; his Followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the Enemies that pursued his Heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Euridice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOw, forasmuch as in this present War all the Rulers of the Provinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new Face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royal House of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it self, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses which overthrew most of them, and out of their Ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the Faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main controversie of Title to the Crown, whereupon all other Quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridæus the King, being simple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polysperchon

Polysperchon desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her Husband serve as a Stale, keeping the Throne warm, till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the Memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind, the danger wherein his Family had been through Alexander's Malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his Head against a Wall, for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him resolve, both to suppress the Lineage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent, who raigned over all, so as they might raign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pytho and Seleucus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their Neighbours. Against these, Peucestes and some others with much ado hardly made resistance, until such time as Eumenes came to them, who propounded to himself great matters which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with Step-dames) hated the Children of her Husband by his other Wives. It was thought that she had given Poyson to Aridæus, which failing to take away his Life, had much impaired both his Body and Wits. Now she considering that Eumenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should, and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece; thought it the best way to joyn with Polysperchon, and set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her Kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polysperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other business, and come to succour her. She herself, by Entreaty, Gifts and Promises, drew to her Party as many of the Macedonians as she could, untill she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her Husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the Revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious Reigns of her Husband and Son, they refused to lift any Weapon against her. Eurydice finding herself thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made Prisoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without Blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear Arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridæus and his Wife in a close Room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them through a little Hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the People should have commiseration of him that had raigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridæus to some barbarous Thracians, who took away his Life by cruel Torments: to Eurydice, she sent a Sword, a Halter, and a Cup of Poyson, willing her to choose the Instrument of her own Death, who praying that the like Presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her Neck to the Halter, having spent her last Curses not in vain. Nicanor the Brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his Friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His Brother Iolaus that was already dead, and buried, she accused of Poyson given to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his Bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this Fury, began to condemn themselves, and the Folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his Death-bed, called this outragious Woman to the Government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

† I.

The great Expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besiegeth her. Æacides, King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never staid to take the City, nor to give order for the state of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polysperchon were there with an Army) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his Associates to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return, and so in all haste he took his Journey toward Macedon, carried head-long with the greedy desire of just revenge. The Ætolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylæ, in favour of the Queen and Polysperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many Ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his Companies, appointing some under Callias, a subtil Captain, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay encamped near to Perbæbia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her Dignity, took more care now to appear Majestical, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn Progress to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander, Heir to the great Alexander, by his Grand-mothers designment; who, during his Minority, kept the Soveraign Power in her own hands. But all this Pomp served to little use, against the violence of the Enemy, that soon presented himself before the Walls; only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would from from all parts arrive, to reſcue Perſons of their Quality. And hereof there ſoon appeared fair likelihood, which as ſoon vaniſhed, and went away in ſmoak.

For Æacides, King of Epirus, made great haſte to bring ſuccour to Olympias his Couſin, with whom Deodamia his Daughter was alſo ſhut up. Nevertheleſs, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certain paſſages taken in the way by Caſſander's men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterpriſe. The Kings importunity urging them to proceed, and the obſtinate refuſal of the Army, brake out at length into ſuch terms, that when he had raged in vain againſt the multitude, his Authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forſake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in Foreign Countries, a baniſhed man; his People joyning with the Enemy, againſt whom he had led them forth to War.

Pydna in the mean time was cloſed up ſtraightly, both by Sea and Land, ſo that neither any could iſſue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it; but it held out as long as any Food was left, no memorable Service being done there, whileſt great Actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her ſtory. Polyſperchon defeated. Extream Famine in Pydna. Olympias yields to Caſſander.

NOW, though order of time require it, that we ſhould rehearſe the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her Deſtiny, which grows the faſter upon her, becauſe ſhe may diſcern it coming; yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the courſe of our Narration, by inſerting her Tragedy in the midſt of things, not manifeſtly coherent with it, we will here (as elſewhere we have done, and elſewhere muſt) continue to end one Hiſtory, that we may not be therewith diſtracted, when we ſhall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the beſieged, remaining in Polyſperchon, was in like manner diſappointed, as their former truſt had been, which was repoſed in the ſuccours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was ſent againſt him, found the means to corrupt the greateſt part of his Army with Money, leaving him within a little while ſo ſlenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other buſineſs of War, than a ſwift retreat. When Famine had ſo far prevailed in the City, that the Horſes were killed as a precious Food, many men feeding on the dead carcaſſes of their fellows, and Saw-duſt being given to the Elephants for Provender; ſome of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave; (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yielded themſelves to the Enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and ſent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, diſperſed by theſe men, did ſo affright her well-willers, that ſuch as had reſerved themſelves to the event, came in apace, and ſubmitted them to Caſſander. At length, when the Mortality was ſo great in the Town, that the living were even poyſoned with the noiſome ſcent of the dead; Olympias bethought her ſelf of ſtealing away by Sea in a Galley that ſhe had; wherein her ſucceſs was as bad as in the reſt. For God had appointed this Town, by her choſen as a place of Refuge, to be unto her as a Houſe of Torment, and a Gaol, out of which ſhe ſhould not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miſeries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccuſtomed to ſo wretched a kind of life, ſhe offered compoſition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Caſſander (who having fetch'd her Galley out of the Haven, accounted himſelf as good as Maſter of her Body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehenſion, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Caſſander. Amphipolis did ſtand out for Ariſtonus, to whom Olympias had given charge of ſuch Forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the ſucceſs of ſome petty ſervices wherein he had prevailed, began to promiſe himſelf great unlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Caſſander's favour, very earneſtly required him upon his faith to her, that he ſhould give it up. He did ſo; and preſently after was killed by his private Enemies, that were ſet on by Caſſander, who partly hated him upon old reſpects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to ſeek innovation.

The death of Olympias, and her Condition.

WHen Olympias had now heard ſorrowful tidings of all her Friends, ſhe her ſelf was called into queſtion, and accuſed in an Aſſembly of the Macedonians, for the Murthers (they were ſo ſtiled in her Affliction, which in time of Proſperity ſhe called Juſtice) by her committed. There was ſhe (being not heard, nor called to ſpeak) condemned to die. The Suit was commenced and proſecuted againſt her, by the kindred of thoſe whom ſhe had ſlain. But it was at Caſſander's inſtigation; who (to haſten the Execution) ſent her word that he would furniſh her with a Ship and other Neceſſaries, to ſave her ſelf by flight: which when ſhe refuſed, ſaying, that ſhe would plead for her ſelf, and tell her own tale; he diſſembled no longer, but ſent unto her ſuch men as hated her moſt, who took away her miſerable life. She was Daughter and Siſter unto two Kings of Epirus, Wife and Mother unto two the mightieſt Kings of that or many other Ages, a ſtout Lady, and of unreprovable Chaſtity; but her Ambition was boundleſs, her Hatred unappeaſable, and her Fury in revenge moſt unwomanly. Her perverſe Conditions made her Husband ſeek other Wives and Concubines, which cauſed her to hate both him and them. She was thought privy to her Husbands death; after which, very cruelly ſhe ſlew his late Wife Cleopatra, having firſt murdered one of her two Children in her arms, and with a beaſtly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper Baſon. For theſe things, her Son Alexander (otherwiſe loving her well) forbad her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more ſevere unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wills, permitted her to live and fulfill the reſt of her wickedneſs; (which was his Juſtice upon the Adulteries of Philip, and the oppreſſion done by him and others) after all which he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own Head.

Cassander celebrates the Funeral of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Cassander gave honourable Burial to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the Daughter of King Philip by another of his Wives; that by her he might have some Title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane and her young Son, to close Prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to increase his Fame, and purchase Love, he built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained Enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia for less Titles, but larger Provinces, with greater Forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

§. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that joyned with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his Commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his Journey through Celosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath been shewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readiness of the People to return to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the less effectual. The Captains of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that he might have more easily dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his Authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him in a Dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich Pavilion, wherein an empty Throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain Pride; but of their Faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings Warrant, which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings Authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relie upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon, in such wise, that Seleucus, having in vain assaied to hinder him, by opening the Sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them; every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former device of assembling in one Pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving Advice, and best able to Reward, by means of the Authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings Treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those who had most power to do good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

ANtigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings Treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the Ene-

Enemies, with intent to give them Battel. Eumenes had fortified the Caſtle of Suſa, and was retired back toward Perſia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his purſuers. The paſſages of the River were well guarded, and good eſpial kept upon Antigonus, to obſerve which way he took. Before he came to Tigris it ſelf, he was to paſs over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he ſought to do by ſmall Veſſels, whereof he had no great ſtore. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a Bridge upon Tigris, came with a thouſand Horſe, and four thouſand Foot, to ſee their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong back into Coprates, wherein moſt of them were drowned; very few eſcaping with life, except four thouſand that yielded themſelves Priſoners, in ſight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loſs made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countrey in the Dog-days, breeding Diſeaſes in his Army, by which many periſhed, cauſed him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Python with him; (leaving Seleucus to beſiege the Caſtle of Suſa) and ſeeking to go the neareſt way, paſſed through ſavage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmiſhes, ſlew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his Troops that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A Battel between him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his Aſſociates fell into conſultation, about the remainder of their buſineſs. Fain he would have had them to enter upon thoſe Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which alſo the Captains of the Argyraſpides or Silver-ſhields were very inclinable, as deſiring to draw nearer to Greece. But Peuceſtes, and the reſt, whoſe Dominions lay in the high-Countreys, had more care of their own particular Eſtates, and would needs march Eaſtward. Theſe carried it; for the Army was not ſtrong enough to divide it ſelf into parts.

When they came into Perſia, Peuceſtes, ruling there, feaſted them royally, and ſought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himſelf. Eumenes, perceiving whereunto thoſe doings tended, ſuffered him a while to keep good chear, till the time of War drew near. Then did he feign an Epiſtle, directed, as from Orontes Governour of Armenia, to Peuceſtes himſelf: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquiſhed Caſſander, and ſent over a great Army under Polyſperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. Theſe news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, ſo they wrought in all mens minds a great willingneſs to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likelieſt appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wiſely, he being far the moſt ſufficient Commander, as they found ſoon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes by ſome miſchance was fallen ſick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take Battel in that diſorder. But Eumenes, when the reſt of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the ſudden did caſt his men into ſo good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deſerved commendations. Yet he did not ceaſe to promiſe great rewards to the Captains, and all ſorts of men, if they would forſake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a Battel. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwiſe, he was inferior in number both of Horſe and Foot by a third part. The Battel was fought with variable ſucceſs, and great loſs on both ſides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the Victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye far from their Carriages; by which means Antigonus (who had a more abſolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the ſign of Victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his Enemies, craving it, to do the like. But a greater ſign of Victory had Eumenes. For he abode ſtill in the ſame place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leiſure, but held the Countrey round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to ſteal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV.

Of divers Stratagems practiſed by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one againſt the other.

Thus did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having ſtout Souldiers, and skilful Generals: but the ſide which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equal Authority of many, from purſuing all advantages to the beſt. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, ſo that to repair himſelf, he could find no way fairer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his Enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far aſunder, ſo that if he could ſuddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great diſtreſs. Between him and them the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderneſs, hardly paſſable. Another way fairer, and leading through a Countrey well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forſook, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, becauſe he would come undiſcovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad unto his men the uſe of fire by night, becauſe he would not have them deſcried afar off. This commandment had been well obſerved four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cheriſh themſelves, being near to their ways end. The light of theſe fires gave notice of their coming; which being reported to Peuceſtes, and other Captains, they were ſo aſtoniſhed with the ſudden danger, that in all haſte they betook themſelves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promiſing to make Antigonus march leiſurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could ſcarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him ſome Companies of the readieſt men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of Mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he choſe a convenient ground to incamp upon, and made great ſtore of fires in ſundry places, as if the whole Army had been preſent. This was a ſorrowful ſpectacle to Antigonus, who thought himſelf prevented vented of his purpoſe; and began to fear leſt he ſhould be compelled to fight, whilſt his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he began to turn aſide, and take the way to ſuch places, as might better ſerve to refreſh his Army. This he did with great care and circumſpection, at the firſt, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, conſidering that no Enemy ſtirred about him, he began to pauſe, and think in himſelf, that ſomewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he cauſed ſome Inhabitants of that Deſart to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had ſeen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the Hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been ſo deluded. Therefore he went againſt theſe Troops with great fury, meaning to take ſharp vengeance on them, for having ſo deceived him. But by this time, ſufficient ſtrength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much buſineſs, and long time. All the Army was come, ſave only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, beſides thoſe Beaſts, had no more than four hundred Horſe-men in his Company. Antigonus hearing of this ſupply coming to his Enemies, ſent above two thouſand Horſe, and all his light-armed Foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his Carriages, and ſo to defend himſelf as well as he could; for his Horſemen being overlaid with multitudes were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the ſpur. Neither knew they, who ſate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them; for on all ſides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of Horſe and Foot, that came unexpected to the reſcue; and charging the aſſailants upon the back, drave them to ſeek their own ſafety by ſpeedy flight. Theſe were ſent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his Adverſary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fitteſt for him to do: and therefore playing both games himſelf, provided the remedy.

The Conſpiracy of Penceſtes and others, againſt Eumenes his Life.

BY theſe means Eumenes wan great Honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a moſt expert General, and well worthy of the chief Command. But Penceſtes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much inſufficiency, were ſo tranſported with envy, that they could now no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a neceſſary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injuſtice to impute the miſchief, contrived againſt worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or ſome other ill deſerving: For, though it often happen, that ſmall vices do ſerve to counterpoiſe great vertues; (the ſenſe of evil being more quick and laſting, than of good) yet he ſhall bewray a very fooliſh malice, that, wanting other teſtimony, will think it a part of wiſdom to find good reaſon of the evil, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cauſe than their vertue it ſelf. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of ſingular courteſie, of a very ſweet converſation among his friends, and careful by all gentle means to win their love, that ſeemed to bear him any ſecret ill affection. It was his meer vertue that overthrew him, which even they that ſought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he ſhould not be ſlain, before the Battel were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confeſſed that it ſtood beſt with their ſafety, to be governed by his directions. Of this Treaſon, he was quickly advertiſed by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleaſures, and by ſome others of whom he uſed to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they ſhould be careful of his good, for fear of loſing their own. Conſidering therefore, and diſcourſing with himſelf of the Villany intended againſt him, he made his laſt Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of ſecret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what courſe were beſt to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire ſtood ill-affected to the Royal Bloud, excepting thoſe which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time ſtood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to ſeek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been againſt his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cauſe alſo it may be thought, that he forbare, either to loſe the Battel willingly, or to fly into Cappadocia, and make ſhift for himſelf among his old friends. At length he reſolved to do his beſt againſt the common Enemy, and afterwards to look to himſelf as well as he might.

The laſt Battel between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THe Souldiers, eſpecially thoſe old Bands of the Silver-ſhields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cauſe, entreated him not to doubt of the Victory, but only to bring them into the Field, and ſet them in array; for the reſt, they alone would take ſufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were ſo miſchievouſly bent againſt him, that they could not endure to think upon being beholding to him for the Victory. Yet he ordered the Battel ſo well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a Horſeman from the ſide of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedneſs, in fighting againſt their own Fathers, would now be puniſhed, as it well deſerved. This was not ſpoken in vain. For the Silver-ſhields were men of threeſcore or ſeventy years old, ſtrengthned more by continual exerciſe, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having paſſed through greater dangers, than any like to be preſented in that Fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their laſt hope with theſe reſolute Warriors, the moſt ancient and beſt regarded of all Alexander's Souldiers) grew very penſive, and advanced heavily, ſuſpecting their own cauſe, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the ſtronger in Horſe, which gave him cauſe of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled Field. Placing therefore himſelf and his Son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did ſet forward couragiouſly againſt the Enemies, that were ready to give him a ſharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peuceſtes, with the reſt of the Lords, and ſtood in the left wing of his Battel, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all means to make head againſt him on the ſudden, and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he ſhould no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, oppoſite unto Python, he beſtowed the weakeſt of his Horſe and Elephants, under one Philip, an honeſt man, and (which was enough at ſuch a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the Fight, and make a leiſurable retreat, expecting the event of the other ſide.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himſelf Maſter of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win ſuch a Victory upon his open Enemies, as might give him leiſure and opportunity to deal with his falſe Friends.

The Foot-men of Antigonus, being, even in their own opinions, far inferior to thoſe whom they muſt encounter, were at the firſt brunt preſently defeated by the Silver-ſhields, who ſlew above five thouſand of them, loſing of their own, not one man. But in Horſe, Eumenes was ſo over-matched, that he could not repel Antigonus, who preſſed him very hard, but was fain to ſtand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought ſo well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until ſuch time as Peuceſtes, with one thouſand five hundred Horſe, withdrew himſelf out of the Battel, leaving his Companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes deſperately ruſh amongſt his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himſelf. And though he failed of his purpoſe; yet with great ſlaughter he did ſo beat upon them, which came in his way, that the Victory hung a long time in ſuſpence, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a ſlight ſandy mould, through the trampling of Horſes, Men, and Elephants, did caſt up ſuch a cloud of duſt, as hindred the proſpect, ſo that no man could ſee what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, diſpatched away ſome Companies of Horſe, that paſſed undiſcovered beyond Eumenes his Battels, and came to his Carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of Fight, ſlenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore eaſily taken. Had Peuceſtes retired himſelf no further than unto the Carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have ſurprized thoſe which came to ſurprize them, and ſo have done as good a piece of ſervice as a better man. But he was gotten ſomewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was ſo over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened ſo, that the Elephants meeting together, thoſe of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himſelf every way over-charged, began to give back, and withdrew himſelf and his Companies in good order, to the other ſide of the Battel, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loſs. The Antigonians had felt ſo much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wiſhed not to ſee him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loſs of the Carriages was reported unto him, as ſoon as he had any leiſure to hear how things went; whereupon he preſently ordered his men for a freſh charge, and ſent for Peuceſtes that was not far off, requeſting him to bring in his men, and renew the Fight, whereby he truſted, not only to recover their own Goods, but to enrich themſelves with the Spoyls of the Enemies. Peuceſtes not only refuſed to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himſelf into a ſafer place, where he might be further from ſuch dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were deſirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing ſomewhat more; and therefore taking half his Horſe-men, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to ſet upon the Silver-ſhields in their retreat; which yet he forbare to do, becauſe it appeared too full of danger. So the Battel ended; wherein Antigonus had not ſo much the better in Horſe, as the worſe in Foot: but the ſpoyl which he got, by ſurprizing his Enemies Carriages, made amends for all his other loſſes.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and ſlain.

Eumenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-ſhields extreamly diſcontented with their misfortune, began to chear them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had ſo cruſhed the Enemy, that he had no power left wherewith to abide them in open Field, and was much leſs able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderneſs, over the high Mountains.

But theſe perſwaſions availed nothing. Peuceſtes was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high-Countreys; and the Souldiers had no deſire either to fly or to fight, but only to recover their Goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver-ſhields, (who had in former times readily conſented unto traiterous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occaſion of making himſelf great, and winning the love of thoſe Bands, dealt ſecretly with Antigonus, requeſting him to reſtore unto thoſe old Souldiers their Goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their Services in the Wars of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a ſubtil man, knew very well, that they which requeſted more than they had reaſon to expect, would alſo with a little entreaty perform a great deal more than they promiſed; and therefore he lovingly entertained the Meſſengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they deſired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were ſeduced to make War againſt him. This Anſwer pleaſed them ſo well, that they forthwith deviſed how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than ſorrow of their loſs, which they ſaid they would redeem by another Fight; in the midſt of this goodly talk they leapt upon him, caught hold of his Sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their ears against all perswasions, would not yield so far, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many Victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their Enemies.

The press of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was fain to send a guard of Horse-men and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered, whom he could not suddenly resolve either to kill or save. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the Son of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in great reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by Famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power to reverse the Sentence, as desiring (if it might be) to have him live his Friend) haste of other business made him do it by the Sword.

To this end came all the Travels of the worthy General, Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelity, and patience, laboured in vain, to uphold the Family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable Examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his government of himself in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor Prosperity his circumspection. But all his Vertue, Industry, and Wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Collignie, Admiral of France, in our days, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the Massacre of Paris; That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himself gave to the Body of Eumenes honourable Funeral; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carry them into far Countreys, under pretence of Wars; but with a privy charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his Friends and Kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beat upon the shoars of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carring away Peucestes.

THe two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idlely; the principal men intentively bent unto the business ensuing. Python began to consider his own deservings; for that the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonus, unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his Indignation, and rebuked the Informers, as breeders of Dissention between him, and his honourable Friend, unto whom he meant to commit the government of all those Countreys: his own business calling him into the lower Asia. These Reports, coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatness with Alexander; his Authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive War. But what need had he to use the Sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewel of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing less than to yield to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient Friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old Acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this business was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province; and a Captain, to suppress all Commotions: thinking belike, that the Power aud Authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this, he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his own mightiness. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Governours in all Provinces; leaving none in Office, that were not his own Creatures, excepting such as lay too far off to be dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good chear to redeem old offences; but was deceived; having to do with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never took effect. Thus he, that envied the vertue of his Friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his Enemy; after which he lived a contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon, by Antigonus. The great Riches of Antigonus.

SEleucus was the next in this Visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonus, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendring unto him that strong Piece, and all the Treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the Place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindness, for fear so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the Treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made up twenty five thousand Talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if Riches were sufficient to Happiness. But large Dominion was the Mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soveraign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of Love, and honoured with Presents, beseeming the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great Gravity, as being due to him, and began to require an account of the Revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, that it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province which was given unto him, in respect of his many good Services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a Reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of Money, nor any other Necessity moved Antigonus to press him thus, but only the desire to pick matter of quarrel against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty Horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions, desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to oppress all, that in former times had been his Betters, or at least his Equals. Antigonus was glad of his Flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without Battel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence, and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many Benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Caldæans brought a strange Prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in Battel. Easie believers may give credit to this Tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather should have hanged those Caldæans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent Pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the Destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he took his Journey into Cilicia, where he wintred. There he took up ten thousand Talents more of the Kings Treasures, and casting his Accounts, found his yearly Income to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

Chap. V.

Of the great Civil War between Alexanders Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

§. I.

The Combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others, against Antigonus. Their Demands, and his Answer.

THis great Riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomy, Cassander, and Lysimachus had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their Practises he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their Love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold Answers which they made occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair Message. Therefore, as soon as the Season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his Victory obtained against Eumenes their common Enemy, and the Honour that he had thereby gotten. In which War, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great loss, with hazzard of their whole Estates, if the contrary Faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that Voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equal division of the Treasures that were in his hands (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the Rate of his new Purchases. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late Victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common Friend, and Partner in the late War, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly Consent unto their Demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, he should yet be able to redeem Peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad Friends, for fear only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them Work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part part of his meaning to communicate with other men the Profits of that Victory, which he alone, without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already ſufficiently gained by him, if they could ſee it, having by his means kept their Governments, whereof they were like to be diſpoſſeſſed by Polyſperchon, and the Councel of Eſtate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they conſidered not how he had ſaved them, ſeeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a Fugitive, and begging ſuccour, he was by his meer Bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Caſſander did not (ſaid he) in thoſe days command me to ſurrender Provinces, and give him his equal ſhare of my Treaſures; but (for his Fathers ſake) deſired me to pity him, and help him againſt his Enemies; which I did, by lending him an Army and Fleet, on confidence whereof, he now preſumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complain of Wrong, that durſt not ſtay to plead his Right? I did uſe him well; but his Conſcience told him that he had deſerved ill: elſe he would not have fled. Let them that ſo curiouſly ſearch into my doings, conſider well their own, which ſome of them can hardly juſtifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomy's Proceedings; and after him, to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

§. II.

The Preparations and beginnings of the Wars.

WHen the Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed with this anſwer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he ſhould be invaded from Europe, as ſoon as he were entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coaſts, and hinder Caſſander from landing in Aſia: giving him alſo in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia ſome that were already ſent over to moleſt him. Likewiſe he diſpatched Meſſengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurniſhed of Money, to draw Friends to his ſide, and raiſe up Troubles to his Enemies. Eſpecially he laboured to make himſelf the ſtrongeſt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtned, than foreſlowed his Journey into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent Commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid Poſt-Horſes throughout all Aſia, to give ſwift advertiſement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held againſt him by any Power ſufficient to maintain the Field.

Ptolomy lay in Ægypt, the ſtrength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of all the People as their natural Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garriſons, better ſerving to contain the People within obedience, than to confront a forraign Enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to ſet great numbers of Artificers on work in making Ships, which was one of his moſt earneſt cares. In theſe buſineſſes he conſumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Joppe and Gaza, which were yielded unto his diſcretion, and well uſed. The ſtrong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by Famine, to render it ſelf upon compoſition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Arms, which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not aſleep whileſt theſe things were in doing, though he kept himſelf within the bounds of Ægypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His Forces were not able to ſtand againſt Antigonus in plain Field, but likely they were to increaſe, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheleſs by Sea (where his Enemy was as yet unready) he ſent his Fleet into all Quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus paſſed with an hundred Sail along the Coaſt of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little diſcomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords, of whom the greateſt adheared to Ptolomy; the reſt were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with Gold, but now redeemed by the Ægyptian with ſharp Steel.

The ſame Commodity of Aid by Sea encouraged the Preſident of Caria (called alſo Caſſander, but not the Son of Antipater, howſoever by the painful and learned Writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is by ſome over-ſight counted for the ſame) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and buſily employ in their Quarrel all his Forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed reſt; but now he threw himſelf into dangerous War, chooſing rather to undergo trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though ſomewhat further diſtant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reſt.

§. III.

How each Party ſought to win the Aſſiſtance of Greece. Antigonus his Declaration againſt Caſſander. Alexander the Son of Polyſperchon revolteth from Antigonus, who had ſet him up.

IN the mean ſeaſon all care poſſible was taken on both ſides, to aſſure unto them the People of Greece, whoſe Aid, which way ſoever it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the firſt Antigonus ſped ſo well by large effuſion of his Treaſure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponneſians, of whom he waged eight thouſand, and cauſed Polyſperchon (who had had a good while made hard ſhifts) to rowſe himſelf again, and taking upon him the Title of Captain of Peloponneſus, to make head againſt Caſſander.

Theſe hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the ſame kind. Wherefore to make Caſſander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To theſe he declared, That Caſſander had very cruelly ſlain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had ſhut up in cloſe Priſon the poor Lady Roxane, Alexanders Wife, and his Son begotten on her Body. That all this proceeded from a deſire to make himſelf King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Theſſalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a Match unfit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to joyn with him in Marriage. That in meer deſpight of thoſe dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own Name Caſſandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great Treaſon of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the Ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For theſe reaſons he required them them to make a Decree, that Caſſander ſhould reſtore to abſolute Liberty the Lady Roxane and her Son, and ſhould yield Obedience to the Lord Lievtenant General of the Empire (by which Name Antigonus himſelf was underſtood) or elſe ſhould be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece ſhould be reſtored into Freedom; this he did, not becauſe he was careful of their Good, but for the need which he had of their aſſiſtance.

Theſe things being decreed, Antigonus was perſwaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Caſſander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto ſuſpected him as a man regardful of nothing but his own Benefit, would correct their Opinion, and think him the moſt faithful of all others to the Royal Blood. But concerning his Loyalty to the young Prince, the World was too wiſe to be deceived with vain ſhews. His undertaking for the Liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got eaſie belief, in regard of his preſent hatred to Caſſander. Yet herein alſo Ptolomy ſtrove to be as earneſt as he, making the like Decree, in hope to win to himſelf that Valiant Nation, which afforded men far more ſerviceable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both ſides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all ſure, deceived himſelf, not without great coſt. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polyſperchon five hundred Talents, willing him to ſet the War on foot in Peloponneſus, whereby it might appear, that on his ſide was meant nothing elſe than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponneſus, Caſſanders men had, with much Blood-ſhed, grievouſly afflicted the contrary Faction; and he himſelf perceiving that they were more eaſily ſpoiled as Enemies, than retained as Friends, thought it the beſt way, to make what uſe he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furniſhed with plenty of Gold, wherewith he was able, not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt ſuch as might ſeem beſt aſſured: he thought it a good part of Wiſdom, to ſurrender upon fair Conditions, that which he could not aſſure himſelf to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he ſent one to deal with Alexander, about the matters in controverſie; letting him know that Antigonus was very skilful in ſetting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only deſiring to have them weary themſelves, whileſt he was buſied elſewhere; that ſo at length he might find opportunity to ſet upon the ſtronger. If therefore Alexander were ſo wiſe, as to keep in his Purſe the five hundred Talents which he had, and without ſtroke ſtricken, to receive the whole Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; it ſhould be freely put into his hands by Caſſander: provided, that he ſhould from thenceforth renounce all Confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a ſure and faithful League with Ptolomy, Caſſander, and the reſt of the Confederates. Otherwiſe, he might well perſwade himſelf, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, ſhould not in haſte be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, ſo ſtiling himſelf, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus ſince the beginning of theſe Wars; among whoſe Followers it was not hard to diſcover the intent (which he did not carry very ſecret) of making himſelf abſolute Lord of all. Therefore he was ſoon entreated to accept ſo good an offer; and did not ſtick to enter into that League, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and ſubject unto no mans Controul.

Howbeit this his Honour continued not long ere he loſt both it and his Life together, by treaſon of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themſelves free, were ſoon after vanquiſhed in Battle by Crateſipolis, Alexanders Wife, a diſcreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husbands Death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in Fight; and having by ſeverity taught them Obedience, did afterwards contain her Army in good order, and governed thoſe places that ſhe held with the Love and Commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IV.

The Ætolians riſe againſt Caſſander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet and Land-Army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomy's Lieutenant. In what terms the War ſtood at this time. Antigonus draws near to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found that with ſo much money he had only bought an Enemy, began to raiſe Troubles to Caſſander and his other Adverſaries in Greece, by ſtirring up the Ætolians againſt them; likewiſe he laboured to win to his Party the Iſlands in the Greek Seas, by whoſe aſſiſtance he might be the better able to deal with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reaſon of his ſtrong Fleet. But neither of theſe Attempts had the ſucceſs which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and always envying the greatneſs of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but ſo, that commonly their Gains equalled not their Loſſes. Caſſander wan ſome of their own Countries; fortified the Acarnanians againſt them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquiſhed in Battel, to forſake their ſide, and bind himſelf to bear no Arms againſt Caſſanders Friends.

On the other ſide, as many petty Iſlands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus: ſo the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, paſſing along the Coaſt of Aſia toward Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilaus, marching on the Shore for mutual aſſiſtance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomies Navy. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalf had been ſent into Peloponneſus againſt Alexander, finding no need of his ſervice in that Country, becauſe Alexander was come over to their ſide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the courſe which theſe Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly ſurpriſed. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the Enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambuſh, whereinto Perilaus falling, was taken Priſoner, with many of his men, and many were ſlain, making little reſiſtance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all haſte to help his Fellows that were on Land; but whileſt he with all his Fleet were intentive only to that buſineſs, Polyclytus appeared at their backs, who as ſoon as he perceived their diſorder, haſtened about the Cape, and charging them behind, ſuffered not one of them to eſcape him. Theſe ill Tidings cauſed Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about ſome compoſition. Firſt, he ſent Embaſſadors; afterwards they met in Perſon. But Antigonus tigonus would not yield unto the Demands of Ptolomy, ſo the Parly was vain.

Hitherto each part ſeemed to have indifferently ſped in the War, and thereby to have equal cauſe of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good ſucceſs of his Affairs in Cyprus, did ſeem to make amends to Ptolomy for his Loſſes in Syria. Likewiſe the Revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy made between the Ætolians and him; as alſo thoſe petty Skirmiſhes, that had been in Aſia the leſs, to Antigonus his advantage, were ſufficiently recompenſed by others of like regard, but adverſe to him; and by the Troubles brought upon his Eſtates in thoſe parts by the two Caſſanders.

Contrariwiſe, Antigonus valued the loſs of his Men, Money, and Ships, no otherwiſe than as the paring of his Nails that were left long enough, and would eaſily grow again; but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed upon a Limb of Ptolomy his Enemy, and ſtrengthened the Body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto ſufficient to counterpoiſe the bad, he meant to proceed as occaſion ſhould direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them that want no Money.

That which moſt moleſted him, was the attempts of his Enemies upon Aſia the leſs; wherein, though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cauſe to fear, leſt the People, being tied unto him by no Bond of Allegiance, might upon ſmall occaſion revolt from him, to men of as honourable Reputation as he himſelf. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in Perſon, where his Affairs did ſeem to proſper the worſe, by reaſon of his Abſence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains as Aſſiſtants, or rather as Directors: the reſt he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to Winter.

How Lyſimachus and Caſſander vanquiſhed ſome Enemies, raiſed againſt them by Antigonus. The good ſucceſs of Antigonus in Aſia and Greece: with the Rebellion of many Cities againſt Caſſander.

THe coming of Antigonus into thoſe parts wrought a great alteration in the Proceſs of his buſineſs thereabouts. For his Enemies had ſhort leiſure to think upon moleſting him in Aſia: they themſelves were held over-hardly to their own Work on Europe ſide. Seuthes, a King of the Thracians, joyning with ſome Towns that rebelled againſt Lyſimachus, brought alſo the bordering Scythians into the Quarrel. All theſe relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with Money and other Aid. The Ætolians likewiſe took Courage, and roſe againſt Caſſander, having Æacides, lately reſtored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Aſſiſtant. But Lyſimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themſelves. He ſuddenly preſented himſelf before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return to their Duty. He fought a Battel with the Scythians, and wild Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Seuthes; and following the heat of his Victory, ſlew Pauſanias in Battel, whom Antigonus had ſent over with an Army; and all his men he did either put to Ranſome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like ſucceſs had Philip, Caſſanders Lieutenant againſt the Ætolians. For he waſted their Country; fought with the Epirotes that came to help them; and after the Victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Æacides, that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Ætolians out of moſt of their Country, and forced them to ſeek their ſafety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he ſent as Priſoners to Caſſander, the principal Authors of the Kings Reſtitution, and of the preſent War.
